A CORRESPONDENT has sent us a copy of school magazine containing some "howlers" which strike us as exceptionally amusing; they are obviously genuine blunders. The secret of the power to amuse in howlers is a certain degree of reality—they should, as reviewers say, be "convincing." Directly they stray into artificiality or elaboration they cease to engage our true sympathy, however brilliant they may be. They are not real. Of course, many excellent examples of howlers have been invented, but if they are of the sort to keep a niche in our memories, where they bear company with old friends and are sure of an affectionate chuckle of greeting whenever they come to the surface, they are all capable of being catalogued as possible mistakes. We must feel that, if they were not actually perpetrated by honest blunderers, they easily might have been. The artificial invention may be witty, but we do not see behind it the working of a distressed and confused mind which by some clearly recognizable process arrives at a conclusion or assertion bearing a likeness to the right answer and yet grotesquely wide of the mark. It is safe to say that "Spoonerisms" are inventions from beginning to end. Some of them are delightful inventions. But the more subtly they tickle the palate the less they relate themselves to honest human bungling. For instance, we all enjoy the episode of the confused man who spent a day searching for an inn called 'The Dull Man' at Greenwich when the true object of his search was 'The Green Man' at Dulwich. But we are captivated by the fancifulness, not overthrown by a sense of happy clumsiness. So it is with schoolboy howlers. We do not cherish most what bear the mark of scholarship, elegance, or wit. Take the excellent mistranslation (which, however, requires the transposition of two words) of Cicero's denunciation of Catiline: Abiit, excessit, evasit, erupit—abiit, he went out to dinner; excessit he drank too much; erupit, he was violently sick; evasit, he laid it all on the lobster. That is not a howler. And we are suspicious of that delightful mistranslation of splendide mendax, "lying in state." But there is the reality of a true howler about the translation, which we find in the magazine before us, of exempli gratia as "samples free."

The mental operations of the schoolboy blunderer might be classified with almost a scientific exactness. We believe that there are four main sources of howlers. First there is the inability to visualize the difference between other ages and our own and other countries and our own. Perhaps this might just as well be called a want of imagination. The defect is not peculiar to schoolboys. It is only that in the minds of schoolboys we see it expressing itself in gross, elementary, or uncouth shapes. If the fundamental difference between Ulster and the rest of Ireland had been appreciated in time, we should not have had the Home Rule Bill in its present form. This is the howler of grown men. When a Board-school child was asked what Prince Harry did when he heard of the illness of his father Henry IV., he answered that he sent a postcard to say that he was coming at once. To that child the England of the fifteenth century was the England of the nineteenth century. Remnants of this defect cling to many people through life. They visit foreign lands and call the inhabitants of those countries foreigners. When the American general who received the submission of the people of Porto Rico in 1898 sent a despatch to Washington reporting the event, he described the welcome given to him by the Spanish population as extremely "patriotic."

The second source of howlers is unassimilated knowledge. Sometimes one can trace the results of cramming. Entirely different events become mixed up, as with the legendary boy who described the death of Jezebel: "And Jabhu said 'Throw her down,' and they threw her down. And he said 'Throw her down again,' and they threw her down again to seventy times seven. Last of all the woman died also

And they picked up of the fragments that remained seven basket full." Such an invented howler takes various forms. A good example of the blunder of unassimilated knowledge is in the magazine before us. It is an extract from an essay on Clive:—

"Robert Clive when he was a boy was very mischifus, he used to clime up to the top of the church spire and look for birds' nests, so his father and mother thought was too mischifous to be in the country, so they got a man to India. It is very curious that Robert Clive never set foot on a ship till he was forty-five years old, but still he became a very great sailor. Clive had some ships, their names were the Pellican and a few more. One time when there was a war going on with Spain Clive and a few other men were having a game of bowels and the Spainards were coming near Clive said let us finish our game of bowels first. ... Then Clive went on to Arcot and he had an army and had a battle there called the Battle of Plassey date 1459."

The same sort of blunder due to unassimilated knowledge was that of the boy who, when asked why John the Baptist was beheaded, said that it was because he insisted on asking Heredias's daughter to dance. Another instance was the answer of the American girl who said that Congress was divided into three classes, the civilized, the semi-civilized, and the savage. Mark Twain's comment on that answer (in English as She is Taught) was so far as we remember, "She knew too much." Accident, it may be remarked here, does indeed often come very near to wit, as in the translation of the boy who said that puris omnia pura meant "boys will be boys." It is a matter for judgment whether some mistranslations do not betray enough intention or malice for one to place them confidently outside the field of honest howlers. Take, for example, the translation of Lebertas sub rego pio, "Our pious king has got liberty under."

A third source of howlers is simple habit of making a shot. And a fourth source—an enormously large one—is the confusion of mind caused by kindred sounds. Howlers under this last head might be called phonetic mistakes. We mention the third and fourth sources together as they overlap considerably. In the school magazine we read: "El Dorado was King Saul's sheep man." This is no doubt a weak recollection of "Doeg, an Edomite, the chiefest of the herdmen that belonged to Saul." We could wish that the boy had said that El Dorado was an Italian who won the race from Marathon. Other answers in the magazine which come under either the third or fourth head are: "The Cabal was a Ministry to place wireless telegraphy"; "Farmer George was Lloyd George"; "Comer is a seaside town in Surrey"; "A metaphor is a suppressed smile." But most of the examples in this magazine are pure phonetic blunders. Everyone knows this sort of mistake. We have all heard of the child to whom the words "Lord, who hastest nothing that Thou hast made," became "Lord, who hatest nothing but the housemaid." Or of the child who, having heard in church the words, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is," apprehended that besides the heaven, earth, and sea, which she knew, there had been created some mysterious creatures or things called "all the tinomies," which her imagination attempted in vain to depict. Perhaps this is to be remembered chiefly as a lesson on the virtue of clear pronunciation in clergymen. A list of well-known phonetic mistakes would be too long to produce here. A few samples will serve. The claimant in the Tichborne case made a fine phonetic howler when he was asked to translate Laus Deo Semper, and said that it meant "The laws of God for ever." One child used to ponder with wonder the strange question in Cowper's hymn: "Can a mother's tender care cease toward the child she-bear?" It was natural for the little boy to say that our Lord, when the penny was brought to Him, asked, "Whose subscription is this?" It was natural, too, for the undergraduate to translate the Greek words for (the nether millstone) "a colt the foal of an ass." It was natural, again, for one high school girl to say that Seneca was the feminine of senex (or was the criticism embedded in this howler too penetrating to be accidental?), and for another to say that the genitive of grus (grus, gruis, a crane) was gruntis, and that it meant a pig! Natural, too, for the boy to say that Solomon and David were fond of animals, as they had so many porcupines!

In the magazine there are the following phonetic howlers: Solomon in all his glory was not a rabbit like one of these. "Petroleum is what you cover floors with." The only pouched animal in America is the apostle. "Hannibal was a well known music writer." "Britt, Omn. Rev. Fid. Def., Ind. Imp. Britain always rains, faithful definite, indicative imperfect." "S. P. Q. R. Answer if you please." "Penlents Lite. A chandelier." "Examen aptum. A huge ape." "Aegre sustinere. To be struck with sickness." "Care Nepos. O high-priced nephew." "Le vilal Allemand. The vile German." "F. R. C. O. (1) Fellow of the Royal Canine Office. (2) Friends, Romans, Countrymen, and Officers." "R. I. P. Redmond's Imperial Parliament."

We wonder whether any master has ever tried to discriminate between howlers and give marks for them, or whether they are invariably heaped together as belonging to the unclassifiable outer world of what is simply wrong. The boy who saw in pendente lite a pendent light, and therefore a chandelier, seems to deserve more for his mistake than the boy who turned Doeg, the Edomite, into El Dorado.

Ritual Murders.

FROM time to time the murder of young children, belonging to the male sex as a rule, by Jews, in supposed accordance with certain religious rites observed by the Chosen people, appear in the Press to horrify the civilised reader and make one marvel that such depths of dark superstition can still linger in the enlightened age of the 20th century. Such tales of cruel fanaticism usually hail from continental countries like Russia and Germany, where anti-Semitic prejudices are especially strong, and where former Governments often found it politic to divert the populace from more important issues by conniving at persecution of the stranger within their gates: the defenceless Jew, who had monies to be robbed off and who was unlikely to be in the position to resist brutal treatment, either on the part of Government officials or the ignorant mob. The idea of child murder being practised by the descendants of Abraham and Moses existed in Great Britain till the 12th century, and the sad, if now proved to be apocryphal, tale of Hugh of Lincoln, raised a wave of popular indignation among the subjects of the third Henry, then occupying the Throne. From an ancient ballad descriptive of that tragedy one learns that Sir Hugh—as the poet calls him,—was beguiled by the daughter of a Jew to enter her house and was there put to death in the manner so realistically set forth in the following verses:—

"She's led him through ae dark door,
"And sae has she thro' nine;
"She's laid him on a dressing-table,
"And stick't him through like a swine.
"And first came out the thick, thick blood,
"And syne came out the than;
"And syne came out the bonny heart's blood:
"There was nae mair within".

Zola himself could not have painted the scene in fuller detail. That gentle Essayist, Charles Lamb, gave as a reason—among others—for his dislike of the Jews that between him and the objects of his aversion arose memories of Hugh of Lincoln. Regarded from a strictly logical standpoint, the notion that human sacrifices of any sort would prove more effectual in turning away divine wrath or in securing the wishes of the party performing the sacrifice, was natural enough: the greater the value of a voluntary offering, the more chance of its being successful in achieving the object aimed at. When Abraham, in obedience to an order conveyed to him in a dream, was ready to slay Isaac—"his son, his only son"—he afforded the first instance in Scripture of a Ritual murder of a purely religious type. That the putting to death of children was not unknown to the Israelites is evident when we find Moses, and later prophets, denouncing their countrymen for "sacrificing their sons and daughters to devils." It should be noticed that the Hebrew word seirim—used in the passages referred to—literally means "the hairy ones", and probably denoted a he-goat, worship of which animal must have been borrowed by the Israelites from Egypt, where the Creator was commonly adored in the form of the creature. In India, the beneficial effect of killing a human being has not died out, for it still is believed in among the more ignorant classes, hence the scares that occur when the foundation of bridge is about to be laid or any public work on a large scale is undertaken. Hundreds of villagers were firmly convinced that Government would never think of erecting the Elgin Bridge over the Gogra or—in present times—the big Sarah Bridge without first propitiating the hidden powers by the slaughter of a child, or children, of tender years. The two most civilised nations of antiquity, namely the Greeks and the Romans, do not appear to have held these views concerning the efficacy of child murder, although the case of Iphigenia, sacrificed at Aulis by the leaders of the expedition against Troy, will at once be called to mind by lovers of classic lore. The wholesale massacre of slaves on the death of a rich Roman patrician under suspicious circumstances was dictated by other than religious motives; the object being to terrify serfs from venturing on reprisals against their cruel masters.

Lately we read an article concerning the Spirit World of the future, the kind of environment we must enter upon after the last fluttering breath has left this "tenement of clay", which goes some way toward explaining the Sutte—Sati, a virtuous wife—custom once prevalent among the higher castes of Hinduism. Although oriental scholars have pointed out that no reference to that barbarous rite can be traced in the writings of the great lawgiver Manu, it owes its origin, we suspect, to the interpretation given by a later Brahmin school to sundry obscure sentences in the Vedas, Puranas and Shastras. That it was attributable to a desire on the part of Hindu husbands to shield their widows from possible insult or outrage at the hands of the Mohamedan rulers may be dismissed as devoid of foundation: Only last week one saw an account of a Khoja in the Madras Presidency being sent up for trial for the murder—performed after the manner of a sacrifice—of a young lad, so the Jew does not possess the monopoly of so frightful a crime. In distant Norway, at a period when a Jew would have been as great a novelty in Scandinavia as a Kangaroo, Tennyson relates in a short poem how the priests of Odin sought to free the country from famine and strife by the shedding of human blood, and that such offering must be chosen with respect to the great value placed on it. Accordingly the king, sorely troubled, surrendered his son as a victim, but when the knife was about to descend on the helpless boy, his queen rushed forward and received the deadly stroke.

"The Priest was happy;
"Oh, Father Odin,
"We give you a life.
"Which was his nearest?
"Which was his dearest?
"The Gods have answered;
"We give them the wide."

The strong protest that the charge of Ritual murder against a co-religionist in Kief has evoked from leading members of the Jewish faith will weigh heavier with the world at large than the accusations of the Russian officials, and the acquittal of the person charged with committing so dastardly a crime is tolerably sure proof of his innocence, since the temptation to gratify the popular hatred of the Jews must have been a strong factor to contend against. That sacrifices of human life will occasionally take place is but too probable, since the sneer of Lucretius has not lost its original force—Quantum religio potuit suadere malorum; superstition is still responsible for many evil actions, but with the growth of more humane sentiments and the spread of education, these must eventually vanish into the Limbo of things that have been. That none but the most bigotted individuals will picture the Jews as delighting in Ritual murders is as certain as that the present generation no longer credits the exploded theory of the sun revolving round the earth or believes in witchcraft.

of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1918, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

London, May 22.

Mr. Bonar Law pressed for the introduction of an Amending Bill saying that it was not fair for the House of Commons to continue the discussion of Home Rule without knowing Government's real proposal. Mr. Asquith replied that he would explain the reason later.

When the Bill came up for third reading, Lord Robert Cecil moved an adjournment, saying that his reason for so doing was that Government would not command a majority when the whole of their proposals were submitted. Mr. Asquith replied that the House of Commons must give a deliberate judgment on the main proposal first. Mr. Bonar Law affirmed that the whole proceedings were farcical and he saw no use in participating in them. The motion to adjourn was rejected by 286 votes to 176.

The Speaker then put the motion for third reading. Thereupon the Opposition raised a chant “Adjourn, Adjourn” and kept up the uproar. The Speaker asked Mr. Bonar Law if he approved the demonstration, but Mr. Bonar Law refused to answer amid frantic opposition cheers. The uproar still continued and the Speaker said that in the absence of Mr. Bonar Law's assistance in maintaining order, a suspension of the sitting was unavoidable. Members left the House amid continued confusion. The sitting was suspended until to-morrow.

Home Rules are not on Order Paper again until Monday. Ministers will thus have time to re-consider their attitude regarding the Amending Bill.

London, May 22.

The Unionists' chant “adjourn” during yesterday's debate in the House of Commons was raised when Mr. Campbell rose to move the rejection.

When Mr. Bonar Law rose to answer the Speaker there were cries from the Opposition back bench of “What right has he to ask that of you?” “Don't answer” Mr. Bonar Law replied:—“Mr. Speaker, I do not presume to criticise what you think is your duty, but I know mine and that is not to answer any such question.”

It is stated in the lobby that Mr. Bonar Law previously appealed to his followers to refrain from disorder. Chanting was confined to some 30 to 40.

London, May 25.

The House of Commons was crowded this afternoon and the wildest excitement prevailed during the session. The answers at question time were almost inaudible owing to the huzz of conversation. There were excited comments when Mr. Asquith entered and cries of “Ipswich” and “Where is Charlie?” were raised.

Some hundreds of Irish Constabulary, armed with rifles and revolvers, have been entrained for Ulster.

London, May 26.

Mr. Bonar Law and the newly elected member for Ipswich Mr. Ganzoni were received in the House of Commons to-day with exultant Unionist cheers.

The Speaker in a statement regretted if his question of Thursday last seemed to impute that Mr. Bonar Law was responsible for the Unionist demonstration. He said it was not always easy in such circumstances to hit the right nail on the head. He did and would do his best. (Cheers). With regard to the demonstration he suggested that Mr. Asquith should make a communication with reference to the amending Bill. (Ministerial Dissent). Mr. Bonar Law cordially accepted the Speaker's explanation and assured the Speaker of the confidence of the House. Mr. Asquith concurred.

The House of Commons passed the third reading of the Home Rule Bill by 351 to 274.

Mr. Asquith, responding to the Speaker's suggestion regarding the amending Bill, said it was the intention of the amending Bill to give effect to any agreement. If however none was reached when it was introduced into the Lords it would embody substantially his proposals of March 9th. Then the motion was put to read the Home Rule Bill a third time.

Mr. Bonar Law affirmed that the Premier had made the usual conciliatory speech but had not altered the facts of the situation. It would be futile and ridiculous to continue the contemptible farce. Let the decision be taken forthwith. (Loud cheers). Let the curtain be rung down, that would however only end the act. It would not end the play. (Cheers). The country would decide the conclusion of the drama.

Mr. Asquith replied that so long as he had the confidence of the Commons he desired no better title to the tenure of the Premiership.

(Ministerial cheers). The Government had redressed an injustice Liberals had suffered for generations. This explained the present attitude of the opposition. The Division was then taken.

The Lords to-day passed the first reading of the Home Rule Bill. Lord Crewe said that the second reading would be taken before June 22nd.

London, May 26.

In a statement in Freeman's Journal Mr. Redmond says that nothing conceivable can happen to alter the fact that the Home Rule Bill is now an Act of Parliament. Despite all prophecies of evil; patience, discipline and mutual confidence have won the day and there is not an Irishman in the world but will rejoice that he has lived to see the end of the Union of Pitt and Castlereach. Its place will be taken by a new Union founded on mutual respect and goodwill.

Rejoicing, illuminations and burning of tar barrels were features of the celebration of the passing of Home Rule in Limerick, Cork and elsewhere in Southern Ireland yesterday evening. There were no disorders.

Albania.

London, May 21.

Essad Pasha has arrived at Brindisi and gone to Naples. He has signed a pledge never to interfere in Albanian affairs.

Essad Pasha at Naples denied that there was a conspiracy in Albania. He said he was the victim of a plot on the part of Austrians and Dutch gendarmes; protested against the outrage on Albanian autonomy and added that his Sovereign had shamefully deceived him.

Rome, May 21.

It is denied that Essad Pasha will be deported to Tripoli.

London, May 23.

A message from Vienna states three hundred insurgents have hoisted the Turkish flag in the town of Kavaja, twelve miles north of Durazzo.

Rome, May 24.

The Italian Minister at Durazzo gives a graphic account of recent incidents. He says that after the capture of Dutch Officers, a dragoman was despatched to parley with the insurgents, who declined to negotiate until they had reached the sea coast. A panic prevailed at Durazzo. The Prince was urged to place the Princess and their child in safety, but the Princess declined to leave her husband. Thereupon the Prince agreed to go on board the "Misurata" temporarily. Subsequently, the insurgents sent a white flag with a Dutch Captain requesting that the Prince should receive the Delegates, who would submit their demands and threatening to shoot the prisoners if the Captain did not bring a favourable reply by 8 tomorrow morning. They also demanded that no further force should be used against them. The Prince went to the palace received the Captain and signed the letter. The insurgents number several thousands. The movement is mainly a religious one; but it not doubted that many of Essad Pasha's supporters are taking part.

Durazzo, May 24.

The insurgents are advancing and the Prince and Princess of Albania and their suite have boarded in Italian warship.

The International Commission which went out to parley with the insurgents returned with the representatives of the latter. These demand to see the Prince.

Athens, May 23.

A hot-headed Greek Lieutenant stationed at Garmia persuaded two hundred and fifty of his battalion to follow him to Epirus to fight the Albanians. The mutineer seized a steamer and forced her captain to start for Epirus, but the Greek Government sent torpedo boats in pursuit and obliged the mutineers to surrender and disembark.

London, May 25.

Austria and Italy have both sent several more war vessels to Durazzo.

London, May 25.

The opinion prevails that the Prince of Albania has greatly jeopardised his position by hastily embarking on board a foreign vessel. A scheme is being considered in Vienna for detaching 500 men from the international force now in Skutari to re-establish order in Albania. The scheme is ascribed to anxiety to avert Austro-Italian jealousies to which the newspapers of both countries are giving strong expression. Meanwhile the latest reports from Durazzo state that the insurgents have released all their prisoners. The Prince yesterday visited all the outposts, everything is quiet.

London, May 26.

The insurgents at Durazzo have formulated a demand for the restoration of Moslem rule. They state that if this is impossible they will place their destinies in the hands of Europe again, trusting that a solution will be found in conformity with Ottoman character and religion. Five hundred rebels at Kavaja tore up the Albanian flag and hoisted the Turkish flag.

In a speech before the Austrian delegation, Count Berchtold announced that Austria and Italy had agreed to interfere as little as possible in Albania and neither Power would act separately.

Italy urgently desires the despatch of an International force to Durazzo. France and Russia are acquiescent. Austria-Hungary does not oppose the idea. Great Britain, on the other hand is disinclined to it and has not replied to the suggestion. Germany likewise has not answered.

LATER.

It is announced that Germany is prepared to contribute a contingent to the International force in Albania provided that all the Powers take part.

London, May 27.

In the Chamber yesterday the Marquis di San Giuliano dealing with the situation in Albania, said that other countries at the outset of their independence had overcome greater difficulties. He hoped Albania would do the same. The insurrection was partly social, partly agrarian and partly democratic. It was also the outcome of Mussalman fears of predominance of the Christian minority. Essad Pasha had undertaken not to return to Albania without the consent of the Powers. The Marquis added that he had had active exchange of views with Count Berchtold on the situation which had inspired mutual confidence and perfect loyalty. The results were that the two Governments were agreed on the necessity for consolidating Albania and the authority of the Prince. Previous decisions with regard to Epirus could not be modified. They would do their utmost to avoid armed intervention and had agreed to ask other powers to assent to the despatch of an International force to Durazzo from Skutari.

Havre, May 21.

Anglo-Italian Relations.

Rome, May 26.

The Marquis Di San Giuliano in a long statement regarding Anglo-Italian relations in the Eastern Mediterranean dwelt on the extremely cordial and loyal attitude of Great Britain in the matter of railways in Asia Minor. He explained details of the agreement whereby Italians obtain railway concessions southward of the Smyrna-Aidin line and the British northward thereof.

Council of India Bill.

London, May 25.

In the House of Lords to-day Lord Crewe formally introduced the Council of India Bill which was read a first time.

Indians in Canada.

London, May 23.

Gurdit Singh the wealthy organiser of the trip of the "Komagata" says that he financed the trip for the purpose of testing the validity of the Immigration regulations. He is prepared to carry the matter to the extreme limit if his countrymen are deported. They claim the right, he declared to migrate anywhere in the Empire as British subjects.

Victoria (B. C.), May 22.

The "Komagata Maru" has obtained a bill of health at the quarantine station but is still being held there and is awaiting instructions from Ottawa before proceeding to Vancouver. Boat-loads of local Hindus have been prohibited from approaching the vessel, which was isolated until the passengers had been examined by immigration officials.

Victoria (B. C.), May 23.

The "Komagata Maru" has been released from quarantine for Vancouver. The Indian leader, Gurdit Singh, is determined to carry the fight to the last tribunals. The examination of the passengers will occupy several days. The vessel is meanwhile moored in mid-stream to prevent any escape from quarantine. Gurdit Singh is communicating with the British Government.

The Victoria Times says that British Columbians cannot for economic reasons allow Indians to enter because they will be swamped by a people whose standards are vastly different from ours and whose presence in large numbers would cause most dangerous disturbances and would be laying up a store of trouble, not only for ourselves but for the Empire. The paper emphasises that the occurrences in South Africa furnished an abundant warning and that they cannot afford to throw down the bars even at the risk of India's loss to the Empire.

London, May 24.

Victoria, May 24.

The Immigration authorities of Vancouver are engaged in conducting medical examination of the immigrants on board the "Komagata Maru" which has not been allowed to proceed to the wharf and is being carefully watched by Government launches. None but official are allowed on board. Individual examination of arrivals for right of entry will begin probably on Tuesday.

Meanwhile the problem as regards the cargo coal, consigned to Lloyd's agents, is being considered by the Ottawa authorities.

No Indians have been permitted ashore even to buy stores, the ship's purser during all necessary catering.

Hundreds of the Hindus of Vancouver attempted to reach the ship on boats but were turned back and they are now not permitted on wharves. No definite instructions regarding the disposal of the vessel have yet been received from Ottawa; but immigration officials have been told to enforce law to the latter.

Trans-Persian Railway.

London, May 25.

Lord Lamington raised the question of the Trans-Persian Railway he declared that it would be the least beneficial scheme for Persia, that it was commercially unsound and that it would become a burden on the finances of India besides involving an increase in the military forces of India and greater naval protection.

Lord Sydenham dealt in detail with a possible branch line.

Lord Crowe said the question had not moved materially since it was last discussed by the Lords in June, 1912. Then Lord Morley had demonstrated the impolicy of a blank refusal to discuss the suggestion. The Societe D'Etudes had not been able to proceed very far and regarding the meaning of Sir Edward Grey's words of May 19th, that he was "prepared to agree to such extension" he meant only leave to survey not to construct.

A railway system to develop Persian commerce was another matter altogether and if a number of small lines were constructed combining trade centres they might suddenly be found a considerable aid to the Trans-Persian line already built. The Government had however already made it quite clear that whatever railway were made any continuation towards India remained an absolutely reserved question and unless they agreed it could not be made. They had also made it quite clear that they were bound to exercise control in the ports of the Gulf. With regard to the suggestion for a line ending at Bunder Abbas, the Russian view was that the only effect would be to abstract from Russia a portion of the trade which legitimately belonged to her. Certain discussions had taken place but no definite conclusion on that subject had so far been reached. From the point of view of the development which the Government had most at heart the construction of lines inland would be commercially more effective than great through lines and preferable from the Persian standpoint.

Tibetan Treaty.

London, May 22.

According to a telegram from Peking to the Daily Telegraph the British and Chinese delegates in Simla have initialled a draft of the Tibetan Treaty. It provides, says the telegram that Great Britain and China shall have representatives in Lhasa and gives to China undisputed sovereignty in outer Tibet, including Koko-Nor.

London, May 23.

A message to the Times from Peking says that the Tibet Convention has been initialled. It is understood that complete autonomy of Tibet proper has been recognised. China is entitled to maintain a Resident at Lhasa with a suitable guard.

A semi-autonomous zone will be constituted in Eastern Tibet wherein Chinese position will be relatively much stronger. The correspondent adds that it is disappointing that he has not been able to learn that provision has been made for the establishment of a British Resident at Lhasa.

London, May 26.

The Times says that Russia has assented in principle to a policy of non-interference regarding Tibet.

With reference to the Tibet negotiations, Reuter learns that nothing has been signed and nothing can be signed except under conditions which do not conflict with the provisions respecting Tibet comprised in the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907. These conditions must of course form the object of discussion with the Russian Government.

Our London Letter.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

The political situation during the week has undergone no substantial change, though the prospects for a peaceful solution of the Irish problem are decidedly brighter, so far as one could rightly judge by the political atmosphere. The Prime Minister has already met Mr. Bonar Law and Sir Edward Carson and, though the Irish Nationalist Leader was not present during Mr. Asquith's "conversations" with the Unionist leaders, Mr. Redmond has likewise privately interviewed the Prime Minister. These proceedings, however, must not lead one to suppose that the Government are negotiating for the acceptance of further concessions on their part, as any step of that nature would produce a serious revolt in the ranks of the coalition and Mr. Asquith has repeatedly warned his political opponents of the finality of his overtures.

The following statement issued by Mr. Redmond last night renders the matter quite clear, so far as the position and the attitude of the Irish Party are concerned:—

The statements which have appeared recently in most newspapers with reference to the renewal of "conversation" on the question of further concessions to Ulster are, according to his information, entirely incorrect. As far as he knows, no renewed "conversations" on the question of further concessions to Ulster have taken place, and the statement that Mr. Redmond himself has been in consultation with Mr. Asquith with reference to new concessions is untrue. The position of the Irish Party with reference to concessions has undergone no change since the second reading of the Home Rule Bill.

Mr. Redmond is confident that the Home Rule Bill will now be proceeded with rapidly, and will receive its third reading, and will be sent to the House of Lords in its present shape, certainly before the Whitsuntide recess.

So it is plain that any further "concessions" are now to come from the Opposition, if civil war is to be prevented. The Government have gone to the very extreme length of conciliation that they reasonably and in fairness to their supporters could, and it is now for Sir Edward Carson and his friends to take advantage of Mr. Asquith's offers. The door of peace is yet open to them and, if they have any patriotism still left in them, they would be well-advised to meet the Government half-way. So far, of course, they have not shown the least sign of their willingness and their genuine desire to secure peace, neither in speech nor in practical politics. As the end of the crisis is fast approaching, let us hope they would at last realise the gravity of their attitude—an attitude which cannot but be described as criminal—and face the situation in that true spirit of real statesmanship that the country rightly expects in her chosen representatives on great national questions.

THE CASE OF COL. AZIZ ALI BEY.

The Agence Ottoman at Constantinople has published a statement to the effect that the grant of a free pardon to Colonel Aziz Ali Bey was due in no sense to foreign influence, but entirely to the mercy of the Sultan and the initiative of the Turkish Government.

This statement, which bears a strong resemblance to a semi-official communiqué, is no doubt intended—and rightly intended—to counteract the effect produced abroad by the "knowledge" that British official influence has been exerted on behalf of the Egyptian officer. It is thus in conformity with the view I had expressed in one of my previous letters to the Comrade, a view that has been seriously entertained by all those who are at all acquainted with the modern political life of Turkey. It is indeed a matter for regret that the above statement was not made a little earlier, before the mischievous agitation in the Press of this country had fully developed, but even now, late as it is, it is bound to create a favourable impression on the minds of those who are earnestly desirous of seeing a strong and independent Government established in Constantinople.

It is fortunate that this novel method of outside interference in a purely domestic affair of Turkey has miserably failed, in spite of the boastful attitude in the rôle of the Colonel's "protector" that has been adopted by the Times. This journal has given its readers to understand that it has taken no little part in securing the acquittal of Colonel Aziz Ali Bey and has tried its utmost to strain the cordial and intimate relations that have hitherto happily existed between Cairo and Constantinople, the reasons for which are obvious enough. In both instances, and particularly in the latter case, the scheme has fallen to the ground. No sane Egyptian has ever seriously believed that the case against their fellow-countryman was only a "put-up job" and that the Colonel had been doomed from the beginning of the proceedings, in spite of a formal court-martial appointed to try him, and further that Great Britain or, to be more accurate, the Times had at last succeeded in saving the life of Aziz Ali Bey. Nor had Cairo for a moment suspected Enver Pasha of jealousy towards the Egyptian officer, as the readers of the British Press had been "informed." Enver Pasha is nowhere more popular than amongst the Egyptians and his faithful services to the sacred cause of Islam, his brilliant achievements on the field, his extraordinary personal courage and bravery, his wonderful powers of organisation and statesmanship and, - last but not the least, the absolute and genuine devotion with which he has been attending to his duties in various walks of life—and that too, let it be at once said, disinterestedly and conscientiously—have gained for him a position unique in the whole Moslem world. To attribute jealousy to a man of such a noble character—and jealousy towards an old comrade-at-arms, who, one is forced to state, under the circumstances, has never even pretended to be anything like a rival to the great hero—would be indicative of a colossal amount of ignorance on the part of those who have ever believed in this remarkable "theory."

The fact remains that the deliberate attempt made in this country to strain, if not to actually shatter, the loyalty, the patriotism, the reverence and the friendship of the Egyptians towards Turkey has luckily proved fruitless and indeed it has incidentally brought about a still further strengthening of the attachment of the people of that ancient land to His Imperial Majesty the Sultan and his Government. This is yet another happy confirmation of the truth of the old saying that "good comes out of evil." It is, therefore, a matter for sincere gratification to Moslems in all parts of the world that the solidarity of Islam, when put to the test, has again proved itself great enough to resist such attacks. If Egypt had really shown the least symptom of her disbelief in the justice of those who had been appointed by the Sultan to try and deal with Col. Aziz Ali Bey in accordance with the laws of Islam, the results, both political and moral, would have been disastrous in more ways than one. In spite of a few telegrams published in the Times from some irresponsible quarters in Cairo and notwithstanding the frequent "impartial" reports submitted to Printing-House Square by that journal's special correspondent in Egypt, one is bound to be driven to the conclusion, on honest investigation, that such an unfavourable symptom had never manifested itself amongst the Egyptian Moslems as a whole. Naturally enough, a good deal of fellowship, sympathy and concern had been noticed in Egypt, but there had not been the remotest trace of uneasiness as to the probability or even the possibility of the Egyptian officer receiving an unfair trial at Constantinople.

The Imperial pardon granted to Aziz Ali Bey has obviously been enthusiastically received in Egypt in common with Turkey and other Moslem lands, and the Sultan's advisers are to be congratulated on the lofty and broad-minded statesmanship they have thus shown. They are equally entitled to the deep gratitude of every true Moslem for the bold and independent way in which they have managed this piece of domestic business, without in any way allowing themselves to be influenced by the vain threats of foreign interference in "favour" of the prisoner—but in reality for other sinister purposes—throughout the proceedings before the court-martial at Constantinople. Turkey will be only too glad to show every friendship and courtesy towards other Powers in Europe, especially Great Britain, whose relations with the Turkish Empire, on account of her vast number of Moslem subjects, have always been of a particularly intimate character; but she cannot afford, in the interest of her own sovereign rights and privileges, to permit any foreign interference, from however influential quarter, in the judicial administration of the Empire. The remarkable way in which the Turkish Government has ignored the floods of protests that had lately become evident in the British Press, during Aziz Ali Bey's trial, and the silent yet effective method in which the Ottoman Cabinet has so rightly snubbed the promoters of this last Anti-Turkish campaign in the newspapers of this country, will, let us hope, succeed in reminding them that when dealing with the new Turkey they are as much bound by the excellent moral underlying the doctrine of "minding one's own business" as they would be in their treatment of any other Power in Europe.

A Muslim subject of the Sultan has been fairly and impartially tried by a court-martial, found guilty of certain crimes and duly sentenced. He has subsequently received the Imperial pardon on the recommendation of the Sultan's legally constituted advisers—which is a not unfamiliar practice in every civilised country. There the matter ends and, as far as the Turkish authorities are concerned, the incident is closed. The host of "conscientious moralists" in this country—whose number is legion, whenever Tur-moralists in this country is involved—ever ready to publicise or any other Oriental State is involved—ever ready to publicise their "superior" and "human" virtues, as soon as they become acquainted with any case in which there has been an alleged miscarriage of justice abroad, would be well advised to turn their attention towards such incidents in the British possessions across the seas—which, after all, is their primary duty—instead of allowing themselves to be overcome with an unusual degree of jumpy enthusiasm in the interest of justice and fairplay in foreign countries, whose rulers are perfectly capable of managing their own affairs with due regard to the proper administration of justice, law and order. The great Eastern Dependency of the Crown and the several Crown Colonies abroad would afford them an ample scope for their activity. Justice and fairplay, like charity, must always begin at home! The British Empire itself should consequently first be rid of all its unrest, and its defects—social, industrial, economic, and political—before these energetic and lofty humanitarians in England conscientiously engage themselves in the gigantic task of putting their tender and highly sensitive fingers on the pulse of the entire mass of humanity in the universe.

CHINESE JOURNALISTIC ENTERPRISE IN LONDON.

A new note in London journalism is sounded by the publication of a Chinese journal, printed in English, but edited by two Chinese graduates. The title of the paper is the Chinese Review. It will appear monthly at a shilling and the May number is just out. The journal is a purely Chinese enterprise, being owned, edited and managed entirely by natives of China, whose foremost aim is the presentation to English readers of accurate and impartial information on the course of events in the Republic.

The first number contains messages of welcome from Lord Bryce, Lord William Cecil, His Excellency Lew Yuk Lin, Sir Walter Hillier, Professor Giles, and others. Mrs. Archibald Little writes on impressions received during her recent visit to China; Mr. Ku Hung Ming contributes an interesting analysis of the spirit of the Chinese people; Mr. Wilson Harris describes the work and aims of the Anglo-Chinese Friendship Bureau; and the editor, Mr. Wong Anincey, examines from the attitude of a sympathetic but, on the whole, severe critic the record of the Young China Party.

The editors, Mr. Wong Anincey and Dr. W. O. Chen, have both received a Western education, Mr. Anincey being a graduate of London University and Dr. Chen a Ph. D. of Yale.

An interesting departure is being projected in the shape of occasional discussions or criticisms of British affairs from the Chinese point of view. "English people are very fond of coming to China and writing about us," one of the editors remarked to a Press representative, "and we think they may be interested sometimes to read what we think of them."

THE KING RECEIVES INDIAN OFFICERS.

At Buckingham Palace on Tuesday last, the King received Major P. E. Ricketta, 18th King George's Own Lancers (Officer in charge), and the following King's Indian Orderly Officers who were presented to His Majesty by Lieut.-Col. Sir J. Dunlop Smith (Political Aide-de-Camp to the Secretary of State for India):—

Risaldar Zaman Khan, 26th K. G. O. Light Cavalry; Subadar Mihar Din, 1st K. G. O. Sappers and Miners, No. 1 Company; Subadar Bostan Khan, 53rd Sikhs (Frontier Force); and Subadar Abdur Razzak, 63rd Palamcottah Light Infantry, Major Olive Wigram (Equerry in Waiting) was in attendance.

HOW BRITISH STATESMEN MAKE THEIR SPEECHES.

A brief description of the various methods adopted by some of the leading politicians of this country in making their speeches may not be without interest to your readers, especially during the present acute stage of the political situation.

At least two members of the House of Commons—Mr. Tim Healy and Mr. Ginnery—take all their notes in short hand, the former using Pitman for the "heads" of his discourse, and the latter relying upon a copious phonetic manuscript.

Mr. Asquith, the greatest Parliamentary master of precision and conciseness, commits to writing certain phrases of any important pronouncement, but on all other occasions he trusts to the inspiration of the moment and without loss of his sledge-hammer and clear-out style.

Mr. Balfour, as is well-known, jots down his main lines of argument on the back of an envelope, but nothing else, whilst Mr. Bonar Law makes a fetish of speaking without notes (except quotations from speeches of adversaries), with consequences that are sometimes inconvenient.

Mr. John Redmond, the last of the old school of orators, is most effective when he speaks impromptu, but he apparently realises the danger of trusting entirely to the inspiration of the moment, and on big occasions he fortifies himself with a manuscript, to which he adheres pretty closely, though always ready and willing to be drawn into "asides."

"T. P.," as becomes the experienced journalist, scorns such adventitious aids, and might have difficulty in deciphering his own manuscript if he ventured to rely on it.

Mr. Jeremiah MacVeagh the Irishman, who delights the House with his humour no less than his ability, has never been known to write any of his famous jokes down on paper. He has them docketed in his mind to fit every occasion, and between the seriousness of his arguments he brings them out to point a moral and adorn a tale.

Mr. Winston Churchill not only carefully prepares his more important pronouncements, but actually commits them to memory, and he may sometimes be seen buried in thought and pacing one of the long unfrequented corridors deliberating with himself on his next utterance.

Lord Hugh Cecil is another politician with a weakness for committing speeches to memory, after which he rarely uses a note; but his brother, Lord Robert Cecil, is more promiscuous in his methods—and, strange to say, more effective. Mr. Lloyd George "thinks out" his line of speech, but relies on his store of celtic imagery for his phraseology.

The Chief Secretary for Ireland, one of the most humorous and most delightful of speakers, never seems to prepare anything or to use any note, and the unpremeditated Birrellisms flow from him like water over Niagara, and at a rate that exceeds the widest of speed limits.

Mr. F. E. Smith's speeches are carefully prepared, and many of his epigrams are suggestive of the midnight oil, but he uses notes very sparingly.

Mr. Will Crooks, a natural orator, never uses notes, his eloquence, his humour and his pathos being entirely spontaneous; and the same may be said of Mr. Keir Hardie, though few would ever accuse the Scotsman of humour.

Mr. John Burns always arms himself with a mass of statistics and other ammunition, and to that extent his speeches are carefully prepared; but he does not place much reliance upon notes or manuscript.

MRS. BESANT'S APPEAL ALLOWED.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Moulton, Lord Parker, Sir John Edge, and Mr. Ameer Ali, has, on the question of jurisdiction, allowed Mrs. Annie Besant's appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Madras in the litigation respecting the guardianship of J. Krishnamurti and J. Nityananda, two Hindu youths, who are being educated in England.

Mr. Younger, K. C., Sir Erle Richards, K. C., and Mr. R. W. Turnbull appeared for the appellant; Mr. Kenworthy Brown, for the respondent; and the Lord Advocate of Scotland, Mr. W. R. Sheldon, and Mr. W. Ingram for the two youths, who had been added as interveners by Order in Council.

The facts of the case, as revealed before the Indian Courts, are no doubt quite familiar to your readers. After the suit was removed to the Madras High Court, where it was heard by Mr. Justice Bakenwell, as everybody is aware, the learned judge had declared the respondent to be the guardian of the boys, and had directed Mrs. Besant to hand over the custody of the boys to the respondent, their father, on or before May 26, 1913. Mrs. Besant appealed from that decision, but the appeal was dismissed by the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Oldfield before whom it was heard.

Mr. Younger, K. C., continued his argument on the preliminary question of jurisdiction. Mrs. Besant had contended before the Indian Courts that the High Court had no jurisdiction over the persons of infants other than that conferred by the Letters Patent of 1865 and that the Letters Patent gave the High Court no power to make the decree appealed from.

The Lord Chancellor, addressing the Lord Advocate, said that he understood that it was stated on Monday that the boys objected to return to India.

The Lord Advocate.—That is so. I am glad you have given me an opportunity of stating expressly and clearly their position. They are passionately desirous of staying in this country and extremely averse from going back to India.

The Lord Chancellor asked the Lord Advocate whether he had satisfied himself personally that that was so.

The Lord Advocate replied that he had.

At the close of Mr. Kenworthy Brown's argument, the Lord Chancellor said that as at present advised his view was that the proceedings in the Court below were altogether misconceived and brought in a wrong form, and for that reason ought to fail, without prejudice to any further proceedings which the father might make in proper form.

Mr. Kenworthy Brown asked whether the difficulty was that the boys were not represented in the Court in India.

The Lord Chancellor.—It is more than that. The boys not being represented, the issues were not properly framed, and the mind of the Court was not properly directed to the true question, but it was not the fault of the Court.

Mr. Kenworthy Brown said a great deal of attention was paid to the issue. He added that the boys were under the extremely powerful influence of Mrs. Besant, who occupied a position in the Theosophical Society, which made her word law. If their Lordships had come to the conclusion that the proceedings in the Court below had been misconceived he did not wish to occupy their attention further.

The Lord Chancellor said their Lordships had made up their minds as to the course they would take. They would humbly advise his Majesty that the judgment of the Court below could not stand, for the reason—the only reason—they had discussed that day. Their Lordships would give their reasons at a future date.

The question of costs was reserved.

ORIENTAL STUDIES: LORD CURZON ON THE SPIRIT OF THE EAST.

A largely attended meeting was held at the Mansion House on Wednesday afternoon in support of the scheme for establishing a school of Oriental Languages in London. The Lord Mayor presided and the company included: His excellency the Persian Minister, Lord Crewe, Lord Curzon, Lord Redesdale, Lord Lamington, Lord Sydenham, Lord Reay, Lord Inchcape, Lord George Hamilton, Lord Peel, Sir Montagu Turner (Chairman of the City Executive Committee), Sir W. Anson, Mr. Ameer Ali, Sir A. T. Arundel, Mr. Abbas Ali Baig, Sir George Birdwood, Sir Stanley Bois, Sir Reginald Brade, Sir M. M. Bhowmaggree, Sir Edward Busk, General Sir E. P. Chapman, Sir Valentine Chirol, Sir Ernest Clarke, Sir William Collins, Sir Homewood Crawford, Sir Louis Dane, Sir Algernon Firth, Sir W. E. Garstin, Prof. Gollanez, Sir Krishna Gupta, Sir Murray Hamrick, Mr. F. Begg (Chairman of the Council of the London Chamber of Commerce), Sir Lancelot Hare, Dr. F. Heath, Sir Frederick Lily, Sir Charles Lyall, Sir Phillip Magnus, M. P., Sir Carl Mayer, Sir T. Morison, Mr. A. C. Morton, M. P., Sir J. D. Rees, M. P., Mr. C. H. Roberts, M. P., Sir Frederick Robertson, Sir Felix Schuster, Sir John Stanley, Sir T. Vesey Strong, Sir Mark Sykes, M. P., Sir Henry Wilson, the Sheriffs and several of the Aldermen of the City, and chairmen and clerks of various City companies.

Lord Curzon pointed out that Germany, France, Austria, Russia, and Italy all spent considerable sums on centres of Oriental study in their capitals. Great Britain, which ruled over nearly 400,000,000 Eastern peoples and had commercial and diplomatic relations with 400,000,000, besides a trade with the East amounting to £200,000,000 per annum, had no such central institution. We had no machinery at all in this country for teaching acquaintance with ideas, traditions, customs, and beliefs of oriental peoples.

In making a strong appeal to the City to supplement the support already provided by the Treasury and the Government of India, Lord Curzon said that they would make a great mistake if they thought the men who went out to the East could get along all right if they merely had a smattering of the native tongue. In the case of a man in charge of a tea or rubber plantation knowledge of the language, customs, and habits of the coolies under him would save many a row—and rows easily occurred under such conditions—and in the long run their firms would be saved large sums of money. In the mercantile sphere, unless the training such a school would give was provided for their assistants, they would see the spoils of their commercial enterprise taken away, as they were already being largely taken away in the Far East at this moment by their active and indefatigable rivals, and most of all by the Germans. The meeting commended to the commercial community of the City of London and to the general public an appeal for the necessary funds.

Lord Crewe said that the balance of expert opinion was strongly in favour of linguistic study being undertaken before young officials went out to the East, while the fact that an increasing number of Indians were familiar with their language literature, and history impressed upon them a reciprocal obligation.

NEW INDIAN BARRISTERS.

Wednesday night last was call night at the Inns of Court, when the following Indian and Burmese gentlemen were called to the Bar:—

TETE À TETE

To AN Address of the House of Commons, dated 7th

"To Exact Reparation".

August 1913, a Return has been published in the usual form with a view to keep the British democracy well informed on the subject of (1) wars and military operations on or beyond the borders of British India in which the Government is engaged; (2) the causes of such wars or operations; (3) the locality in which troops operated; (4) the results obtained; (5) the numbers approximately of the troops employed; (6) the cost of such wars or operations; and (7) the amount of any contribution towards such cost from the British Treasury. Fortunately for India and for her neighbours there is very nearly a clean bill of health for the quinquennium 1909-1913, the only exception being the Abor expedition. The Return tells us with commendable brevity and clearness that the Abor Expeditionary force consisting of 2,500 troops and 400 Military Police operated on the North East frontier in Dihang Valley, Abor country, between October 1911 and April 1912 and that the bill of costs amounted to Rs. 21,60,000, towards which the British Treasury, of course, contributed nothing. When we turn to the column: "Object of the Operations", we are told, as, of course, we knew, that they were undertaken "to exact reparation for the murder of Mr. Williamson and Dr. Gregerson by the Muizong Abors." We hope it will not be accounted to us as the height of brutality to point out that each of the two aforesaid lives lost cost India more than ten round lakhs in cash and our troops and the Abors a good many more lives than two in kind. And the "Results Obtained"? We are informed that "the tribe was completely subdued after two or three small actions and the capture of their stockades, and the murderers were delivered up". When the Abor expedition was being arranged, we had asked the Government a single and a simple question, but in vain. It will serve no purpose to refer to "Christless Cude" that wants a life for a life. Christendom has worked itself free from the shackles of turn-the-other-cheek policy, even if its men of affairs had ever heeded it at all. But granting that a life must be taken for a life, and putting on this doctrine the gloss that more than one life may be taken for a life when it happens to be a case of a neighbouring country or people and not of fellow-subjects in the same State, we must at least satisfy ourselves that the life taken for which we are to take many more lives was taken without any justification. What was Mr. Williamson, a servant of Government, doing in the Abor country beyond our borders when he lost his life? We had asked this question three years ago, but no answer was then vouchsafed. May we not ask it again when Mr. Lewis Harcourt has publicly repudiated the deliberate insubordination of Mr. Corfield in Somaliland and is, in spite of sustained "Imperialist" agitation, still impenitent? Did not the Mullah deserve castigation like the Abor after cutting of Mr. Corfield? Why no reparation exacted? And had the prestige of the white rulers of India to be established only among the Abors? Were there not Tibet and China also in the background? Again, even if Messrs. Williamson and Gregerson had never lost a hair of their heads, would not the circumstances that arose towards the end of Lord Minto's regime and that induced Lord Hardinge's government to revert to the system of Chief Commissionership under more direct control of the Government of India, have compelled Government to "make things hum a bit" on the North East Frontier? When will Western diplomacy learn to call a spade a spade? It is some consolation at least that the Abor Expeditionary Force was not called a "Mission" and the real object was not disguised as "to civilize the heathens and bring peace to them". On the whole "to exact reparation" is good!

It is true that many even among the educated Indians interested in politics do not understand much about the arrangements concerning the disposal of business in the India Office. But it is equally certain that the Secretary of State for India and none else is the person primarily responsible to the King and to Parliament for the good government of India. He is the principal and the Governor-General in Council is the agent, as Mr. Montagu had clearly stated in the House of Commons on a memorable occasion three years ago. Naturally, therefore, India is greatly concerned in everything that is likely to affect the settlement of Indian issues placed before the Secretary of State. It is true that he is an autocrat, in theory at least, and Mr. Birrell once envied the autocracy of Lord Morley. But even autocrats are susceptible to influences and it is distinctly against the interests of India to allow the Secretary of State to be powerfully influenced by individual members of his Council, who in the majority of cases are retired Anglo-Indian officials with settled views and inclinations often at variance with those of Indians. A Secretary of State not particularly distinguished for taking an independent line of action now proposes to divide his Council into departments with a member at the head of each, instead of some committees of two or three, and we in India, who have some idea of Departmentalism and what havoc it plays with Council Government, naturally feel anxious. The two Indian members, who are not always chosen for being "experts" in the bureaucratic sense, are able to represent Indian points of view by a method of permutation and combination on all questions before they are brought before the Council, and even if they are not brought before it. With a clear demarcation of departments we shall be splitting the India Office into more or less watertight compartments in most of which the Indian point of view will not be represented. Moreover, Indians have their own views about the method of selecting the Indian members adopted by the Secretary of State as well as about the proportion of the Indian, English, and Anglo-Indian members in the Council. A Congress deputation which, so far as we have been able to ascertain, shares on the question the views of the All-India Moslem League, has travelled all the way to England to lay its views before Lord Crewe and has made this an important part of its programme. Lord Crewe, too, has reverted to the practice of his predecessor and also his own earlier practice and has not only received the deputation, but also promised to consider their representations carefully. But if we are to believe the Pioneer, the Bill "is merely concerned with a reconstitution of domestic arrangements affecting the disposal of business in India Office." We really admire the naivete of language of our contemporary. "Domestic Arrangements!" Isn't it superb, exquisite, delicious? But is not the entire business of Indian administration a "Domestic Arrangement"?

No one would seriously argue that Indian Mussalmans have not had a share out of the "general awakening" that these piping times are said to have produced in India; and if the testimony of the expert psychologists of sundry hues counts for anything, they have had more than their legitimate share quite recently and have almost "awakened" too much. Apart, however, from the outward symptoms of this awakening, which have alarmed their "friends" a good deal, there are few other signs to show that they have been really restored to a full, healthy, wide-awake consciousness. If "awakening" means anything, it means that a community or a group of people has begun to realise its wants and make serious efforts to provide ways and means for meeting them. Has the Moslem community become thoroughly alive to its needs? It is, no doubt, true that some sort of general feeling has grown up among Mussalmans that all is not well with them. One also hears some din and clamour of effort in some places. The Muslim Press, too, is vocal with eager voices pressing to be heard. But a careful student of Moslem affairs would discern little useful purpose in all the lively discussions of the hour, no method and no design, in fact, no serious, intelligent and systematic effort to study, elucidate and solve the fundamental questions relating to the progress of the community. Much of the literary energy, that certain recent circumstances have called to birth in the shape of Moslem journalism, is running to waste along unproductive channels—in interminable and senseless debates about first principles, in the rehabilitation of exploded myths, in sentimental adulation of impossible virtue and equally absurd denunciation of impossible evils, in personal wrangles, revuls and strife. It seems as if Mussalmans have not yet settled even the general lines of communal advance. Everything that really matters would seem to be an open question still, and every communal patriot is busy generalising with tremendous fervour and assurance. The Moslem democracy is beginning to be vocal, and it is no fault of a democracy if it cries aloud for knowledge and faith. But the real danger is that its genuine and helpless cries for more light are sometimes taken as the oracles of Delphi, which bustling persons of certain mental and moral density set themselves noisily to decipher for the guidance of the whole community. قریس is said to have spoken when, as a matter of fact, some perplexed souls inquire, in earnest but broken accents, about the right path and the ultimate goal. The anxieties and uncertainties of the mass of the people are exploited in some cases with ruthless thoroughness. They are turned upside down; they are paraded as popular vendicts, and the process ends finally when the قریس gets back its doubts stamped as its own mandates by the eager interpreters of its wisdom. We wish it were possible to teach these busy exploiters of Muslim democracy that their ceaseless spinning round communal perplexities is leading nowhere. We wish they could understand that what the masses of the people want is real guidance and faith. The masses are alive with a genuine desire to learn, to know and to do. They want direction and a fair amount of assurance that the path they are asked to tread leads to salvation. The duty of the Moslem Press is to try to supply this great need. The main lines of work have already been laid down. The programme needs no recasting after every week or month. Even the discussion about ways and means has not been wholly unfruitful. What is now wanted is to press every individual into active service for the building of the future. Quest for ideals and principles has lasted long enough in all conscience and some "discovery" has already been made about the first and last things. It now remains to fill in the plans of reconstruction with details, to devise suitable methods and to co-ordinate effort. The field for constructive work in the development of the Moslem community is vast and the Moslem Press should give the lead by helpful suggestions and encouragement, by intelligent discussion of questions needing elucidation, by focussing opinion on matters requiring public attention and organised action.

We could name a score of matters of topical interest to the Moslem community about which, however, the Literary Contributions to The "Comrade."

Moslem Press discussions are either vague and inconsequential or violent and sterile through partisan bitterness. They generally lack intelligent interest and earnest efforts to reach practical conclusions. In this respect, however, journalists are not wholly to blame. They cannot obviously go on delivering their obiter dicta on a number of topics without wearying themselves and their readers. What they want to say on a subject is said once or twice or even thrice, but they must in the end turn to other topics from sheer exhaustion. The real, sustained and fruitful "discussion" of important matters is not brought about in the editorials but in the correspondence columns of a newspaper, in which persons interested in particular subjects state their points of view and conclusions, or argue disputed points and thus help to create real public opinion. We have often invited our readers, some of whom are persons of remarkable gifts and therefore quite competent to offer helpful advice or criticism, to initiate discussions in our columns on current matters of public interest. Our request has, however, been seldom fruitful of great results. We do not, of course, mean that we receive few literary contributions for The Comrade. Our daily mail bag brings dozens of "letters to the editor" and other manuscripts for publication, the majority of which are not at all suitable for the purpose. They are either lengthy "essays" on things in general or huge and breathless dissertations on quite trivial affairs. The art of newspaper correspondence has not yet fully developed in India. The casual correspondent has yet to learn that he would lose not an atom of his weight and effectiveness if he says what he wants to say in as few words as possible. He sometimes needs to be reminded that he is not the first man in the world who has discovered the "importance" of a certain "subject," and that he needs not therefore introduce it to his fellow-men by beginning from the birth of creation. We regret we may have caused some annoyance to several correspondents by our inability to accept their contributions, but we would request them to exercise greater care in the choice of their subjects and to state what they have to say in as brief a way as they can. Our greatest desire is to keep our columns always open for the discussion of matters of real public interest from all possible standpoints.

We are glad to note the progress in England of our distinguished fellow-countrymen who have gone there as the Congress delegates. The venerable

A Faint Memory.

Sir William Wedderburn gave them a breakfast on the 14th instant and a conference was held after the breakfast. Among the distinguished guests that came at least to honour our friends by breakfasting in their company, if not to take part in the subsequent conference, we notice with pleasure the names of three prominent officials of India, Sir Basil Scott, Sir Benjamin Robertson and Sir K. G. Gupta. On their arrival in London another high official, the Hon. Mr. Chaudhary, had received the delegates. We have a distant recollection that two Indians had once upon a time gone to England where they were being asked to dine with some prominent Englishmen, including some former Viceroy and Lieutenant-Governors. An eminent fellow-countryman of theirs, who drew no salary from the Indian Exchequer, was only too anxious to take them by the hand and show them every hospitality, when an Ogre, called the Lord Chancellor, turned the beautiful dream into a nightmare by objecting to his participation in a "political dinner." Is it really true or are we dreaming?

In closing his Resolution on the Revenue administration for the last year. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces observes that during the year the Hon. Sir Unavoidable?

Duncan Baillie K. C. S. I., and the Hon. Mr. G. A. Tweedy will retire from Government service "inflicting an almost irreparable loss upon the land revenue administration of the Province." It is a relief to know that the loss is only almost irreparable, and one knows, in spite of the official assumption to the contrary, that no one is absolutely indispensable. But is the loss absolutely unavoidable? May we not hope to secure an Executive Council for the United Provinces in time to avoid the "almost irreparable loss"? Or will the Council have to wait till Sir Duncan Baillie and Mr. Tweedy have both left and younger men can take their place? We thought the only thing the Council was waiting for was the departure of Sir John Hewett. Is it possible that the U. P. Government's alleged aversion to "young men", of which one hears so often, is insincere, or does it apply only to non-officials?

The dramatic news from Albania throw little light on the real tangle of the situation beyond making it clear that the affairs of that unhappy land are in a thorough mess. Since the Concert of Europe decided to preserve the individuality and integrity of the Albanians by turning the province into an independent principality, there has been little progress towards the establishment of civil government and peace. Even some of the boundaries of Albania yet remain undefined. A Protestant German Prince has been imported as its new ruler, but he commands little allegiance in his new kingdom and the task of settling the people to peaceful and ordered reconstruction seems to be well beyond his strength. Hellenic intrigues set early on foot a general revolt in Epirus which, led by officers of the Greek army, declared for autonomy. There have been wholesale massacres of Moslem children and women as well as of men, and unspeakable atrocities have been committed by the Epirote revolutionary bands. The "protecting" Powers have looked on without moving a finger, and now it seems that the Epirotes have been pacified by the grant of extensive concessions regarding the formation of their own gendarmery, language, education and appointment of Christian governors under the guarantee of the Powers. Trouble is also brewing on the northern frontier. Montenegro has proceeded to occupy the Albanian districts assigned to her by the Concert, but the population of these districts, almost entirely Albanian, detests Montenegro and would not submit to her rule unless it is crushed by force. On the eastern side some of the most fertile districts of Albania have been torn out of the Principality and handed over to Serbia. The Albanians of these territories are being harassed and persecuted in innumerable ways. They are being forcibly ejected out of their homes and their lands. The stream of refugees from across the Servian frontier is constantly pouring into Albania bringing harrowing tales of misery and distress. All these factors have combined to exasperate Albanian feeling and a spirit of deep restlessness and discontent with the existing state of things has been growing among the people. They are feeling injured, maimed and helpless. The independent, proud and sturdy mountaineers, who are never known to have forgiven an insult or suffered quietly a wound to their self-respect, feel bitterly the humiliation of their present position. Their civil affairs are in chaos. Europe has imposed upon them a supreme authority for which they can have little love and respect. Their own leaders are either fickle and selfish or feeling the heavy weight of pressure from interested Powers which has rendered them powerless to act. In the circumstances, what is now happening is natural and intelligible. Essad Pasha's mysterious arrest and his deportation to Italy is a coup that can not be expected to pass off without an aftermath. He is a powerful chieftain, perhaps the most powerful Albanian leader who can make or mar the future of his country. He is not a man of unimpeachable record. He is wily and astute. His services to his former master, the Sultan, were tainted with gross infidelity. His loyalty to his own country is questionable. He is ready to play for his own hands under any master. For sometime he was the protégé of Austria-Hungary, and received Prince William by loudly swearing his allegiance to him. He has now fallen out with the Prince, and has contrived to become the favourite of Italy. Whether in his present quarrel he is in the right matters little. The situation that the episode has produced is fraught with serious possibilities. The Albanian cabinet has resigned. Thousands of Moslem Albanians have marched on the capital determined to have their demands accepted. The Prince first sought safety in an inglorious light to an Italian steamer. Saneer counsels have, however, prevailed and he has come back to his palace to negotiate terms with his enraged subjects.

The demands of the Moslem Albanians are significant and the movement behind these demands seems to be formidable. The Albanian Moslems demand the restoration of Moslem rule, but if this be impossible, they will place their destinies in the hands of Europe again trusting that some solution of the difficulty will be found "in conformity with their Ottoman character and religion." In some places Albanian flags have been torn down and Turkish flags hoisted. We can easily see how the Concert will treat these demands. Its "honour" has already been committed to a certain solution by the appointment of Prince William. That solution has well-nigh failed. But the interests of Austria-Hungary and Italy demand that no other solution should be tried but the one which they have helped to devise and which lends itself magnificently to the success of their respective diplomatic games. Albania has been allowed to come into existence as an independent State, not because the claims of nationality are held sacred and inviolable by the Chancelleries of Europe, but because only an independent Albania could furnish a convenient hatching-ground for the Austro-Hungarian and Italian designs in the Balkans and the Adriatic. It is these ulterior designs that have led the Powers to impose an alien ruler on Albania. Otherwise, the easiest solution of the difficulty would have been to let the people choose their own ruler. The Albanian nationality is composed of various creeds, but the most considerable portion of it is Moslem. It is, therefore, the Moslem Albanians, who far exceed their brethren of the Catholic and the Greek faiths in number and strength, whose views about the government of their country should have been predominant. What respect and allegiance can a people entertain for a ruler who does not share their traditions and their faith? The Powers ostentatiously claimed to have avoided the possibility of rousing creed jealousies in Albania by fixing their choice on a Protestant Prince. They have well-nigh brought the country to the verge of anarchy by this much-haunted device. The Prince remains in splendid isolation, unable to command the esteem and confidence of the people. He cannot catch the national imagination or inspire popular enthusiasm. A strong, magnetic personality, racy of the Albanian soil or which, at any rate, can appeal to the intimate sympathies of the race, can alone become a strong, rallying symbol of Albanian sovereignty and unite the people for the purposes of common national life. The demand of the Moslem Albanians for Moslem rule is the genuine national cry of Albania. Her difficulties will not end till this demand is satisfied. The demand may be suppressed by the weight of an international force that may be sent to vindicate the authority of the Concert, but it would be the barest hypocrisy to claim afterwards that Europe strove disinterestedly to preserve the Albanian nationality from destruction and give it a chance for independent life.

A fortnight ago we had complained of the sad lack of humour in our erstwhile bright contemporary, Punch, when it hoped to raise a laugh out of the following:—"Oil has been discovered in Somaliland, and it is rumoured that the Government is at last about to realise that its obligations to our friendlies demand a forward move against the Mullah". We had characterised this as part of the merest commonplaces of the East. And now for the fulfilment of the Punch prophecy and the proof of our contrition. On April 23rd in the House of Commons Mr. Fell asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies "what steps were being taken to do away with the unsatisfactory position which prevailed at Berbera and in British Somaliland; if he was aware our friendly native tribes were being harried by the Mad Mullah incessantly and our troops penned in at Berbera; and that the whole position was detrimental to the prestige and position of this country with the whole of East Africa". Who can doubt after this the "friendliness" of our "friendly native tribes" or the madness of the "Mad Mullah"? Do not our friendlies get harried just when we get a fresh access of altruism, and does not the Somali Mullah show distinct signs of being non compos mentis in harrying them and reminding us of our prestige and position in the whole of East Africa just at the moment when we have struck oil? Mr. Fell is quite right in asking Mr. Harcourt "if he intends to do nothing

"but wait for the death of the Mad Mullah". In the compelling interests of eugenics—our latest deity—we must wait no longer but kill the madcap, thus preventing his propagation of other Mullahs equally "Mad". Mr. Fell and the Punch humourist must both be happy at the reply of Mr. Harcourt that "we are taking immediate action". A "friendly" in need is a friend indeed.

Mr. Asquith, speaking at the 51st anniversary dinner of the Newspaper Press Fund, posed a number of searching questions as to the value and utility of the press in public life. He said that there were a number of problems in connection with the relation of the press and the public upon which it would be tempting to enlarge. Some of them, in his opinion, might form fitting questions in an examination paper for the Civil Service or for posts of distinction in the Universities. "For instance" he said, "this, I think would be a very interesting inquiry: 'Which institution would a democratic country more readily dispense with, its Parliament or its Press? Or, again—and this is a less drastic suggestion—would the world be better off or worse off if for a limited time, say for a fortnight or perhaps for a month, there was a complete and universal suppression of newspapers? Or, if I may put another problem, there is the wider question which must sometimes present itself to every reflective mind. Does the press of the world on the whole do more good or harm? I am far from suggesting that upon anyone of these issues, if they were submitted to what is now a fashionable and favourite form of suggested submission—what is called a referendum—you would carry with you of the total votes polled a large and a working majority. The only thing I should stipulate would be that the votes should be taken by ballot.' If a democratic country found itself forced to choose between its Parliament and its Press, its choice would be determined by the issues of a free fight between the journalist and the demagogue. Opinions would naturally differ as to which of the two protagonists is the stronger, but there is some force in the contention of those who hold that the demagogue is a pampered creature of the press and would shrink to a little measure if he were deprived of newspaper 'puffs'. No one would dispute the fact that the press has grown to be an immense power in the lives of modern democracies, though it is not easy to determine how far it is a power for good. Life of high-pressure has deprived the busy industrial democracy of to-day of all leisure to think for itself. The press has become its thinking organ and provides it with ready made opinions as the outfitter's establishments provide it with ready made clothes. The press caters, so to speak, for the intellectual hunger of democracy. It manufactures views and distributes them on wholesale principle. Its commercial basis allows room for the growth of much that is evil. This is a part of the price that the existing organisation of democratic society has to pay. Whether there is a possibility of the growth of a new process for the wholesome, unadulterated creation of views and opinions and their easy distribution, it is for the future to discover. As things are, the suspension of the press for a fortnight or a month, even if it might make life easier and freer in the end, would starve the mind of the democracy and even demagogues would find their occupations gone.

The first number of the Sikh Review, a monthly started from Delhi with a view to promote Sikh interests, holds promise of an interesting future, and a good deal of care and energy seem to have gone to its production. The publishers have set before themselves an ambitious programme, but there is no reason why they should not work their way to some measure of success if they have enlisted the support of the enlightened members of their community and conduct the periodical on proper lines. The Sikh community, though small in numbers, is not lacking in strength and cohesion. It has recently shown considerable energy in the field of education. New schools are being started in different Sikh centres in the Punjab, movements for the education of women and social reform are beginning to yield tangible results and the future holds bright prospects for this sturdy community. With the liberal help and patronage that the Sikh educational movement and other interests have been uniformly receiving from Government, the Sikhs are already well able to hold their own amongst the different communities of the Punjab. There has, however, been a tendency, much more pronounced of late, amongst the Sikh communal patriots to urge their sectarian claims without due regard to the interests of other classes of the people.

In the language question, for instance, they have come to take an attitude that is hardly reasonable. They want to introduce Panjabi as the language of the courts in the Punjab and the medium of instruction in public schools. The claim is obviously extravagant. Apart from the bewildering variety and the extreme literary poverty of the primitive dialect known as Panjabi, it should be remembered that the large majority of the people of the Punjab desire to retain Urdu as the official and literary language of the province; and it is manifestly absurd to think that the whims of a small minority should be allowed to prevail at the expense of the important interests of a great majority. The Sikh Review places the advocacy of Panjabi in the forefront of its programme. We are afraid this will only add to existing racial bitterness without promoting the true interests of the Sikhs themselves. A couple of articles in the Review, in "which peculiarly" violent attacks have been made on Aurangzeb, the Great Moghal and the "Great Turkish (Moghul) Empire," hardly breathe the spirit of unity and peace that, according to the publishers, has been the inspiration of their undertaking. They not only offend against the ordinary canons of literary taste, but also bristle with flagrant historical inaccuracies and misstatements. The Moslem rule is described as "the rule of tyranny and injustice." The Moghal Dynasty is spoken of as "the tyrannous Moghul" and so forth. Aurangzeb is said to have starved his father to death. All this passion and violence and garbled history are indulged in to vindicate the purity and grandeur of Gurm Tegh Bahadur. We have no wish to say a word against the Guru and his political activities. But we put it to the educated Sikhs themselves: How would they treat a man who, under the cloak of religion, is found engaged in seducing people from their allegiance to their lawful sovereign? Gurm Tegh Bahadur, as a political revolutionary, was no more than a rebel and a seditionist and it is a wonder to us that Aurangzeb gave this man, so dangerous to the peace and security of a part of his Empire, such latitude and inflicted punishment on him only after he had tried all other peaceful means to dissuade him from his unlawful courses. Our Sikh enthusiasts perhaps know the fate that would be in store for a man who flouts the authority of the King-Emperor in India to-day, who tampers with the loyalty of his army and sows disaffection among his subjects. It is only fair to admit that Aurangzeb, whose name is occasionally sought to be blackened by politicians who sometimes create history, could have made short work of the militant sect that at the instigation its leaders was becoming openly mutinous and laying waste the country side. But he chose to be tolerant and forgiving. And the reward that he gets for his tolerance from the latest exponent of Sikh interests is a shower of invective and abuse.

To Poesy.

Not fadeless garlands of Pierian flowers
As, for Apollo's brows, the Muses twine
By sacred streams, whose living waters shine
'Mid charmed groves and amaranthine bowers;
Nor yet such blossoms as, in bounteous showers,
Fall from the Muses' spotless hands divine
Upon the Poet when, like maddening wine,
Love's ecstasy his ravished soul o'erpowers,
'Tis mine, O Heaven-born, at thy feet to lay;
But withering leaves and fading flowers that grow
In dust and heat along Life's common way;
Mixed with the trailing weeds that keep them low.
Such as they are, thy fostering bounty may

The Comrade.

The New Leaders of India.

WE endeavoured to show in the three previous articles under the general heading "Young India", how certain influences peculiar to Indian conditions affect the development of the Young Indian's personality from the cradle to early manhood. We sketched in brief outline his home environment, his school atmosphere and the life he lives in the college. It would be tolerably clear even from these fragmentary sketches that the development of the character and mind of the young educated Indian is a very unsatisfactory process, and in the majority of cases he enters life after his inner race has been run. How to save India's youths from a sort of intellectual paralysis and their optimism from an irretrievable loss of vitality and zest, is a problem with which we do not propose to deal at present. The ultimate solution of it would seem to be in the direction of a thorough reform of the methods and system of education now in vogue in this country. Most of the intellectual and moral puzzles of the Young Indian arise from the unsettled state of Indian society. Western thought and culture have let loose vast destructive forces and old social values and standards are in conflict with the new. The younger generation has to face all the muddle of a duality in social doctrines, and the burden of picking and choosing the essentials for a complete social reconstruction is not a light one. What is called a period of transition is a very painful and trying process—it is the travail of a new birth. Those that happen to be born within this period are mostly the helpless instruments of a remorseless process of change—they are thoroughly used up for the ends of the future. They do not know whither they are drifting, they have to bear the burden and become the sacrifice.

It would not, however, do to console ourselves with the comfortable theory that the process would work itself out some day without any meddling on our part. The will of man is the most effective force in human things. It can bend, change or create circumstances and environment. And the trained, organised will and intelligence of a community are never needed so much as when it is passing through a period of transition. Efforts that are being made in India to-day to organise public will and intelligence are not yielding very satisfactory results. The defect lies in the type of education which is producing the new generation of educated Indians, whose intellectual confidence has, in most cases, been shattered in the process, whose character is not equal to the task, whose efforts are half-hearted and whose purposes are dim and fleeting. The only remedy is the organisation of a thoroughly national system of education controlled mainly by the people themselves. This is by far the greatest need of modern India. Political and social activities would be comparatively barren of good results as long as this root-problem of Indian social reconstruction remains unsolved. In spite of the havoc wrought by the existing system of education, there are enough men in the ranks of the educated classes who are intellectually virile and have a clear conception of the problems of Young India, its doubts and fears, its mute tragedy, of the smouldering embers of its faith and aspiration. Their gaze is clear, but their purpose is not yet set. They preach abundantly and even with a note of passionate protest. But they hesitate to act. This is the one serious failing of Young India.

The progress of modern education in India, though not very rapid, has been considerable. It has been of a sufficiently long duration to judge it by its fruits. The rate of educational advance has varied amongst the different communities, and the position of the Moslem community is the most backward in this respect. But the general growth of education has reached a fair level even in the backward communities and all the progressive movements in India are being mostly inspired and controlled by men who have received modern intellectual training. It would not, therefore, be out of place to attempt an estimate of the new leaders of thought and action who have come to preside over the destinies of the Indian people.

The diversity of religious creeds in India has naturally created a diversity of outlook in the people. Their ideals, history, traditions, racial characteristics and temperaments display a great variety and have brought into existence different needs, which are in some respects mutually irreconcilable. The Hindu's conception of the past and his outlook about the future are not identical with those of the Mussalman. In spite, however, of the vast racial, historical, and cultural differences that divide the various communities of India, the great social problems that confront them all are in essence the same. All alike have to bring themselves into harmony with the new conditions of things, to recast their respective social systems in the light of a new set of ideals which the modern civilisation has evolved. The needs of the various communities may vary in degree and may require different methods of treatment, but they are identical in origin. The main tasks of the Hindu and the Moslem reformers depend for their execution on similar qualities of character and mind. The social problem of both the communities is one of adaptation. The leaders of the new movements, be they Hindus or Mussalmans, alike need trained intelligence, strength of purpose and powers of organisation. They alike should have a perfect grasp of their past efforts and ideals, a thorough familiarity with the efforts and ideals of the West, a capacity to choose and judge, and a bold initiative. They are alike subject to similar political conditions and certain other broad influences from which they cannot tear themselves away.

The Young educated Indians, who have entered life and begun to take responsible part in the affairs of the country, are hampered by limitations of similar character, irrespective of race and creed. The obscure stresses and conflicts of the period of transition have stamped themselves on their characters and minds. Most of them have been irremediably mangled in personality and are condemned to bear the affliction of a dull sense of failure at their ineffectual lives. The few that have emerged from the process of "education" with comparatively sound hearts and minds, lack courage and capacity for sustained endeavour. Irresoluteness, indecision, readiness to temporise, nervous fears to face consequences and lack of courage to take risks are the besetting failings of Young India. These are weaknesses of character, that has never passed through the bracing rigours of action. The Young Indian is mostly a giant in theoretical speculation. He shrinks from coming into grip with circumstances. He would never try to bend them to his will as long as he can help it. It is not, therefore, surprising that he often grows into a merciless critic of things in general, idealising about impossibilities and shielding himself from the little, necessary, aggressive things which constantly thrust themselves on his attention and which in their cumulative effect have the utmost bearing on the welfare of the people. His love of delivering theoretical judgements explains his dislike of all practical efforts. In fact, both are the symptoms of the same malady.

Nothing tantalises the young educated Indian so much as the old type of communal leaders. His dislike of their ways amounts almost to derisive contempt. The feeling has grown much more pronounced among the younger generation of educated Mussalmans. Yet little effort has been made by the impatient young enthusiasts to come forward and set an example to the old "despots" of how things should be done. They shrink from accepting responsibility in any direction. Their capacity to suffer abuses is phenomenal. They let things go on, and while they keep on a running fire of angry criticism at a distance, they would not move a finger to put a stop to the senseless muddle. They seem to think as if it were no concern of theirs. It seldom occurs to them that the affairs of the world have to go on, that mere grumbling has never set human affairs right, and that if they do not take active part in the direction of the affairs of their community and country others more active and self-reliant than they must needs control and direct them. What right have they in such a case to complain of the follies and errors of those, who, whatever their limitations, have certainly much greater self-reliance and sense of duty than their more pretensions critics? The young educated Mussalman is often heard to complain of the way in which his community conducts its politics. He calls it a silly game in which men, with private axes to grind, are playing at obsolete "policies" with antiquated methods. Why does he not come out to the front with his better methods and better policy? He speaks with scorn of his community's educational conferences. If he thinks he has enough capacity to make these activities fruitful, why does he hold back like a guilty thing from showing his hand? He thinks little good has come out of the Moslem educational movement for women. Why does he not try to rescue the movement from collapse and put more life and vigour into it? There are scores of other matters about which he is dissatisfied and never loses a safe occasion to denounce those whom he considers to be generally responsible for the ills of the community. But his communal patriotism stops short at destructive criticism. He does not care to move an inch from his attitude of critical negation towards some practical genuine effort for positive achievement. He looks on at absurdities, errors and even corrosive evils with passive resignation. He has enough sense to see that things are bad. Has he no sense to realise that they might become infinitely worse? And does he think that they can be made better by dint of aspiration? His attitude is dangerous, for it is producing a depressing atmosphere in which the faith of the masses in the efficacy of ameliorative effort and action is beginning to be undermined. He is producing an intellectual and moral fog, in which things of vital moment seem to be indistinct and vague. Of what use it is to talk of progress and reform when one has lost discernment, when one can not distinguish the white from the black, when one has no courage to face difficulties in doing what is right. Things may go on as they are, when all that is has to be. It is equally useless to talk of absurdity, error and evil when there is no positive passion for truth to crush absurdity and expose error and no moral wrath to uproot evil. It is not surely from such a temporising, half-hearted race that men of heroic stature would arise to redress the woes of the Mussalmans. Men of resolute purpose and clear vision are needed who are ready to act, to suffer and to achieve.

The Press Act and Proselytization.

In the course of the now famous judgment of the Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins in our Pamphlet Case his lordship had said: "I recognise the force of the argument that the Act (the Press Act) 'is now being applied to a purpose never intended'". But Sir Lawrence perhaps forgot that intentions, like everything else in a hot climate, expand enormously. Although the Hon. the House Member was the author of the new Contempt of Court Bill and was therefore extremely careful of the respect due to a judgment of three of the seniormost Judges of the Calcutta High Court, he nevertheless pointed out to the learned Chief Justice that he had misinterpreted Government's intentions in passing the Press Bill of one of his predecessors into law. But unless the Hon. Member accepts our theory of expansion in relation to intentions, he would find it difficult to justify the application of the Press Act to the two religious papers of the Mussalmans in the Punjab, the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr.

Let us first take the case of Ahl-i-Hadees. Last year the "Newal Kishore Press" of Lahore published three small volumes of a book or tract in Urdu entitled Isbat-i-kaffara (Proof of Atonement.) Its author was Rev. Thomas Howell Bashir, Pastor of a Church belonging to the Christian sect of the Church of England. On the cover it is indicated that the publication was a rejoinder to objections raised against the Christian doctrine of Atonement. The preface makes this still more clear and we learn therein that a Mufti Sadiq Saheb, who was a Christian for a time, once more became a Mussalman, and as such delivered a lecture on the doctrine of Atonement when Khwaja Kamal-ud-din took the chair. The author says that he had asked the Khwaja Saheb's permission to question the lecturer at the end of the lecture which was withheld "on account of the obstinacy and bigotry of members of the Ahmadi sect," and he was thus prevented from making a rejoinder then and there. Sometime after this the Mufti, who had lectured, published a book called Kaffara (Atonement.) The three volumes of Rev. Howell's book, Isbat-i-Kaffara, are, we are here informed, a rejoinder to the lecture and the book of Mufti Sadiq Saheb. As regards the Christian doctrine of Atonement, we need say nothing as it is too well known, and we do not think any one would accuse us of injustice to Rev. Howell if we said that it is rather difficult for anyone to discover a new argument to prove this doctrine. But the way in which the old arguments can be presented are innumerable, and whatever merit Rev. Howell could claim could only lie in the presentation of his case. We have no desire to set up as a controversialist or even a judge of such polemics, but we cannot refrain from saying that Mr. Howell's methods are certainly not Christ-like, even if they are Christian. We do not know how Christianity is benefited by referring to the Prophet of Islam as having in his heart "the seed of sin which is called the Devil's part", which was repeatedly taken out by the Archangel Gabriel and equally repeatedly grew again. Is the doctrine of Atonement likely to be proved to the satisfaction of a rationalist by saying that Mohamed "frequently remained in subjection to Satan and Sorcery"? What relevancy has the following in a discussion about that Christian doctrine:—"Notwithstanding 'Gabriel's endeavours to remove it by repeated washings, the blackness of (Mohamed's) heart, which was the seed or spermatozoa of 'sin or the Devil's part, could not be removed; or perhaps Mohamed 'used to blacken his heart by not guarding it and repeatedly committing sins.' Or take this as a sample of the Reverend gentleman's style of argument: 'Mohamed was caught in the vapour of 'Holl . . . In the battle of Uhud Mohamed had a tooth 'knocked off besides receiving other wounds. All this was visited upon 'Mohamed on account of his sins with which he was loaded till his death'. Turning from the Prophet to his faith and to his followers we get the following:—"The Mussalmans and their divines who committed the crimes of adultery and theft, did so according to the 'desire of Mohamed and behind the screen of 'There is no god 'but God (the first part of the Moslem formula of faith). . . Through 'this (Islamic) teaching, not only did the number of Moslem prostitutes increase in this world, but Paradise also was filled with scores 'and ghilman and became a quarter full of brothels.' Take another sample—"It is the Mohamedan formula of faith which not only encourages a sinner to sin, but is also acting as a digestive pill to assist "him in the digestion of sins. And encouraging people to sin beyond 'measure (sic), in practice, thanks to the Mohamedan formula of 'faith, not only are the brothels and the bazars of the towns filled 'with Moslem women who repeat the formula of the faith, but the 'gaols have also been filled'".

It has been said that there is never a controversy about religion but religion is a loser. For our part, we cannot ignore the necessity of religious controversies, and missionary religions cannot avoid them. But the history of the preaching of Islam offers unshakeable evidence for the belief that the example of lives well lived and the few words whispered earnestly at moments when the soul expands and yearns for truth and communion with another soul, are far more effective than all the religious controversies in the world in winning true converts. Possibly Rev. Thomas Howell's scheme of conversion is quite different and he relies upon vituperation of this kind for giving him the converts he seeks. Obviously it does not matter to him a bit whether his proselytising methods wound the religious feelings of the Mussalmans or not. But it is too much to expect that the people whose religious feelings are wounded would remain wholly indifferent to Rev. Howell's vituperation. "Tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye" supplies an obvious method of securing satisfaction; but the infuriated Mussalman is to a great extent denied this opportunity of easing his feelings. The Christian theologian can denounce the Quran as a fabrication, and a fraud; but the Mussalman, although he may allege interpolations in the Biblical text, is prevented by his own religious belief from denying the Divine origin of the Christian scriptures. Similarly, a Christian may call the Prophet of Islam an imposter and an evil person; but a Mussalman's religion imposes upon him respect for the personality and character of Jesus Christ as a Messenger of God. Obviously, therefore, if a Moslem theologian, no matter how incensed, offers a reply to Christian abuse of the Moslem Scriptures and the Moslem Prophet, he can only denounce certain Christian doctrines which he regards as the creation of later glossators of the Bible and Jesus Christ's claim to divinity put forward not by him but by a large majority of his followers. It is only within these limits that Christ or Christianity can be criticised by Mussalmans. This must be clearly understood, for on this hang the cases both of the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr, both of which wrote their peccant articles as rejoinders to Rev. Howell's book on Atonement. To take the case of the Ahl-i-Hadees. This paper, which is an important religious organ of the Moslem sect of "the people of the Tradition," understood the Christian doctrine of Atonement, to be as follows:—

Our Christian friends believe that sin is divided into two kinds—original and sin against the law. They define natural sin in this way: Because man is the son of Adam, who committed sin, every son of Adam is sinful by nature. And the sin against law they define thus: that disobedience to Divine law in sin. By these two suppositious definitions they conclude that Jesus was not the Son of Adam, because he was borne only of woman and that consequently he was the Son of God. Moreover, as he did nothing against the law, he was sinless and can, therefore, atone for the sins of all mankind.

The Ahl-i-Hadees had attacked the first part of the Christian argument in a previous article on "Jesus of the Gospel" in which it had sought to prove from the Christian Scriptures themselves that Jesus Christ was the offspring of the union of a man and a woman, and can, therefore, be no more devoid of "original sin" than any other person born of such union according to the Christian doctrine of Original Sin. In the article which drew upon it the wrath of the Punjab Government not a word is said even remotely suggesting that the writer believes Christ to be a sinner, and all that he has permitted himself to do with reference to the first part of the argument is to quote these three facts from the Bible:

I know it is so of a truth: but how shall man be just with God?—Job ix, 2.

For there is not a just man upon earth, that doth good and sinneth not.—Ecclesiastes, vii, 20.

If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.—I John i, 8.

We are not here concerned with the merits of the controversy; but can any one say that the method of controversy adopted by the Ahl-i-Hadees is not in glaring contrast with that chosen by the Christian Pastor? It is not for a Mussalman to abuse Jesus Christ, but he can argue that those who infer from the circumstances of his birth his freedom from sin and from that the doctrine of Atonement do so by ignoring passages contradicting these claims which the Bible itself contains. This is indicated by the title of the article itself: "Atonement in the Bible: Was Jesus of the Gospel Sinless?" (the italics are ours.) He then goes on:

If for the sake of argument, we suppose that he was born without father, that in no way proves the point of our Christian brethren, because it is written in Job xiv, 4: "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one;" xv, 14: "What is man that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman that he should be righteous?"

The writer also argues that "woman is more sinful than man, because she did not sin herself alone, but induced Adam to sin," and once more quotes the Bible: "And Adam was not deceived; but the woman being deceived was in the transgression." (I Timothy ii, 14.)

So much for the argument about Original Sin, and what is there here which is "calculated to bring into contempt the Christian 'population of the Province', as the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab thinks, or 'wantonly scurrilous and offensive', as the Secretary of State is compelled to describe?"

Let us now see whether the writer in the Ahl-i-Hadees has done anything more reprehensible in dealing with Christ's sinfulness or sinlessness according to the law. Once more we must bear in mind that the writer is not dealing with Jesus as the Mussalmans know and venerate, but with "the Jesus of the gospel". What he does is to quote texts from the gospels and, whether one agrees with his interpretation or not, it cannot be denied that the texts can be interpreted in a manner which do not do justice to so great and holy a personality. The well-known text in Mathews: "I come not to send peace but a sword" etc, can easily bear an interpretation wholly different from that which Christians accept, and we have no doubt that if an Indian patriot used such expressions to-day the police would have something to say to him and the authorities of our colleges would certainly hold up the man who boasted that he had come "to set a man against his father" to public opprobrium in the interests of discipline. Take again Christ's abuse of the Pharisees and Scribes as "an evil and adulterous generation" and a "generation of vipers". We know what the Pharisees and the Scribes were like in the days of Christ; but have we no Pharisees Scribes among us who can count on the support of officialdom when "Young hot-heads" call them by names not half as abusive? Again, Christ accused the Prophets who had preceded him of being "thieves and robbers". The writer quotes other passages and offers a running criticism of unequal merit, and finally cites Mathew xix, 17 "And he said unto him, Why callest thou me good? There 'is none good but one—that is God". So much for "Jesus of the Gospel". But what of Jesus as the writer believes him to be. Does he consider him to be a disturber of peace and a man given to abuse of others, an ungrateful son or a brother without affection, the author of vain prophecies and a teacher of dissembling, fond of loving women who were not related to him, and of wine drinking as, according to him, the texts cited by him suggest? Let us give the reply in his own words. He concludes the peccant article with the following:— "In short according to the decision of the Old and the New Testaments 'Jesus was sinful by 'erigion', and according to law. If he was 'sinful he cannot atone for the sins of others, according to the Christian teachings. So Jesus can in no way carry away the sins of all 'Christians. Christian friends, give up this unbecoming and fanciful 'idea of Atonement and believe in the Holy Book 'which in a few but portentous words calls Jesus son of 'Mary' illustrious in this world and the world to come.' And this, if you please, is 'calculated to bring into contempt the Christian population of the Province'. This, of all things, is 'wantonly scurrilous and offensive'! The Christian population of the Province would be brought into contempt for their unchristian conduct rather than by their belief even in the doctrine of Atonement. But is there no Moslem population in the Punjab and did it never occur to the highly sensitive Government of the Punjab that it could be brought into contempt by being alleged to be the followers of one whose black heart could not be cleansed even by the repeated washings of an Archangel? The Punjab Government has, to our knowledge, taken no notice of the Christian Pastor of the Church of England who attributed the loss of a tooth by the Prophet of Islam and other injuries sustained in the battle of Uhud to the sins of which he bore the load throughout his life and for which he was caught with vapours of Hell; but it at once becomes alive to the far reaching results of the imputation—and that too pointed out merely to prove the absurdity of such inferences from the Bible itself—that Jesus died young and was crucified because he was rude to "the mother who kept awake for nights "that he might sleep, who many a time went without meals "that he might eat and bore trouble that he might rest in comfort." Does not the Bible say; "Honour thy father and mother that thy days "may be long," and does not Mathew tell us that "Jesus said unto "her, Woman, what have I to do with you?" Is not the argument at least as good as that which accounted for the loss of a tooth by Mohamed in the battle of Jehad? It is true that perhaps neither one nor the other would give the rival missionaries a single convert; but is Sir Michael O'Dwyer so little occupied with the ordinary duties of administration that he must teach missionaries how to convert as well as teach journalists how to conduct newspapers in his vast leisure? Again, even the prestige of Piccadilly has to be maintained at the cost of ten thousand rupees in cash and a large printing press to a writer of poignant prose, but is not the honour of their women at least as dear to the Mussalmans of the Punjab and has no law yet been framed and enacted to deal with a foul-mouthed "trafficker in souls" who ascribes the overcrowding of Punjab brothels and bazars to the Moslem women's belief in the formula: "There is no god but God and Mohamed is His Prophet"! The Zamindar shall not even publish the statistics of divorces in England, because that would bring the purest Anglo-Indian maid and matron into contempt; but Rev. Thomas Howell Bashir, Pastor of the Church of England could not possibly bring the Mussalmans into greater contempt than the world already feels for them by reason of their yearning for a Heaven of lechery and worse.

This is no new case, for we have had all the documents concerned with us for a full six months. But we awaited the result of the appeals of the Ahl-i-Hadees to Sir Michael O'Dwyer and in the last resort the reply of the Secretary of State to a question in Parliament. Both are now before us and they need more than a little comment. To the prayer of the publisher of the paper, the well-known Molvi Sanaullah of Amritsar, the Government of the Punjab deigned to reply after three months of deliberation and cogitation that Sir Michael O'Dwyer saw no reason to reconsider his orders regarding the security. Once more he petitioned His Honour to reconsider his decision and pointed out that in his case it was not only he who was required to deposit a security of Rs 2,000, as a publisher, but that the keeper of the Press also where the Ahl-i-Hadees is printed has been required to deposit Rs 1,000, which amount, too, the publisher has had to provide. This, as he states, is against the practice of the Punjab Government; but evidently His Honour does not believe in the doubtful virtue of consistency, and after another month's deliberation and cogitation expressed his regret that he cannot accept the publisher's representation.

That, however, is nothing. The paper has furnished the "good conduct" money and may lose it any day so long as the Press Act remains on the Statute Book in its present form. But the reply of the Under-Secretary of State to Mr. Morrell adds insult to injury. "The Secretary of State has read the articles and 'can only describe them as wantonly scurrilous and offensive.'" What shall one say to this but say he can only describe the reply as an unmitigated misstatement. We know our England and our Englishmen with their wonderful equipment for learning Oriental languages and their still more wonderful linguistic aptitude. And we know our Secretary of State also. He is incapable of being able to read the articles in question as the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab of writing them. What he has probably read is the English composition of a Secretariat hireling who can translate: as "O, destroyer of the garden root and branch" and who can summarise a long and learned thesis on the possibility of Virgin Mary being a hermaphrodite in a few words as filthy and disgusting as the wretch himself. And that is how India is to be ruled by the "man on the spot" and retained "on the floor of the House of Commons!"

An Appeal.

We have received the following appeal from Canada from Mr. Sunder Singh:—

"As there is a lot of misunderstanding about our movement and the position of the Hindus in Canada, I give below some idea of my labours since coming to this country. I came to Canada in the year 1909 with the idea of making my way like an immigrant from any other country. I got the fever of get-rich-quick type as it was in the very air which I breathed.

"But owing to the grace of the All-loving One I reverted to the teaching of my father which was:—

From the Unreal lead us to the Real.

From Darkness lead us unto Light.

"Speaking about myself is repugnant to me, but I find that I have to write of these things so that my friends and helpers may know exactly where I stand.

"Since coming to Canada I found the position of my countrymen uncertain and pitiable in the extreme. With one or two exceptions they had practically nobody to help them in their time of need. Therefore I volunteered for this service and for the last four years have kept at it since. I spent my time and whatever money I could get for the advancement of this cause. The people of Canada know me as three years ago my countrymen deputed me and three other friends to interview the Dominion Government at Ottawa regarding the admission of the families of my countrymen. I have stuck to this mission of service through good reports and evil reports and through thick and thin, knowing it to be a service to God and humanity. Sometimes it seemed that even the mother earth beneath my feet gave way, but this much I know and am fully certain of that God has been kind to me and my mission.

"Over three and a half years ago when everything was dark and I was laid up on account of a very serious illness due to overwork and mental strain, kind friends to whom I can never repay for what they have done for my cause, took up the case on our behalf. With their help and active co-operation an English paper called The Aryan was launched. I never solicited for contributions, for verily did I believe that God will see to the needs of his people. In fact many a time I have refused financial aid offered to me for the cause even in this country.

"The Aryan was kept going for more than a year letting the public know of our trials, shortcomings and successes. Two years ago the thought came to me to go ahead with the scheme of a printing press of our own which had been dormant in my head for a long time. Up to now this mission of mine had been practically a one-man-crusade against heavy odds. I know very well that I had a sympathiser here and a friend there, but the idea of having a press to print a paper both in English and Punjabi was astounding. It needed an organised effort. However, God opened the way and one of my countrymen believed in me and my mission. He came forward as a volunteer. The two of us had not much of capital to speak of but we had a far more precious thing than money and that was faith in God and man. (Some other time when I have more space at my disposal I will describe to my readers our sorrows and trials.

"We did not know very much about printing. But the plan had to be put through anyhow. New helpers and offers of money for our mission came and finally this paper, The Sansar, saw the light of day in May of last year. The hardship and privations which we underwent were as nothing compared to our joy, when we found that a great pillar of our cause, viz. a printing press, was in running order.

"But since this was done I found that there were rocks ahead. The forces of darkness which were watching all the time gained a fresh impetus. Although I fully believe that they are just an illusion (maya), but still this ignorance had to be contended with. These friends tried to scatter our mission to the four winds, but up to now the Lord God has sustained us by his abounding mercy and grace.

"The present time is a critical juncture in the history of our mission. We find that although averse to ask for contributions from our friends to carry on this mission, we are compelled to seek financial help from them. Therefore we appeal to you for your help and co-operation in our work of education and uplifting of our countrymen in Canada and thus bring about a higher and better understanding between the Orient and the Occident.

For this purpose we need immediately about $2,000 (Two Thousand dollars) or about six thousand rupees to meet the demands of our present building and plant. There is a mortgage on our building which has only two months to run and has to be paid at the end of that time. This debt is hampering us in our action and it is to free ourselves of this and enlarge our field of activity that we make this urgent appeal. This sum of two thousand dollars will give us the needed scope for further service and usefulness. We on our part have given our services both in energy and time gratuitously in the past and are prepared to do so in the future. Therefore we give all our sympathisers and friends an opportunity to aid us by subscriptions or inducing others to help us in our just case.

Knowing your sympathy and interest in all movements for the uplift of humanity, allow us to appeal to you for help in bringing about the dawn of a great day when the Brotherhood of Man will not only be a theory but something more tangible.

Please send your contributions in aid of this mission to Dr. Sunder Singh, 630 Speed Ave, Victoria, B.C. Canada.

MALARIA.

18. It remains to consider the results of research as applied to the chief tropical diseases, always remembering that they are liable to revision or modification in the light of further investigation and discoveries. The most important tropical disease is malaria. After allowance has been made for the tendency to attribute to fewer deaths from other causes, malaria stands out as universally prevalent in India and in many tracts, is a scourge far greater than either plague or cholera. It maims as well as kills and causes more sickness, misery and death than any other single disease. Measures for the prevention of malaria aim at breaking the cycle of infection in two ways, (a) by attacks on the parasites in man, and (b) by the destruction of mosquitoes. To the former class belong the different systems of quinine prophylaxis and treatment; and to the latter, all those measures which aim at abolishing mosquito breeding grounds. Both methods have been successful in other countries and both have been tried extensively in India.

19. The Government of India have arranged classes for instruction in practical malaria work twice a year. The course is so planned that each member of the class takes an actual part in the preparation of a malaria survey which will eventually be the basis of a practical scheme of malaria prevention. Already 155 medical officers in civil and military employ have passed through the classes. It is hoped before long to spread a large number of trained and active workers over the whole of India.

The Lucknow Sanitary Conference recommended that a malariologist and engineer should be deputed to Italy to study the methods of "colmate" and "bonificazione" under the auspices of the Indian Research Fund Association, and it is hoped to arrange for their deputation. The effect of silt deposit on the malaria conditions of deltaic areas in India is also receiving attention; and interesting experiments are being conducted by the Government of Bengal at Berhampur. Experiments in clearing jungle and undergrowth will shortly be undertaken.

PLAGUE.

20. The Plague Research Commission, which was constituted in 1905 and is still continuing its investigations, has thrown much light on the etiology and epidemiology of the disease. The chief conclusions that have been reached so far may be summarised as follows:—

- (1) In India, where the pneumonic form of the disease is relatively rare, plague is essentially a disease communicable to man and a few of the lower animals, an epidemic amongst men is directly dependent upon an epizootic amongst rats.
- (2) Plague spreads from rat to rat and from rat to man through the agency of the rat flea.
- (3) The plague bacillus under natural conditions does not long retain its vitality outside the body of the rat, the rat flea, or man.
- (4) Plague has a definite seasonal prevalence, generally constant for any given place, but varying in different parts of India; investigation shows that the plague season coincides with the season of maximum prevalence of rat fleas.
- (5) Infection is carried from place to place only over very short distance by the spontaneous movements of rats: in other cases, infection is carried either (a) by the agency of man or personal effects acting as a means of transport for infected fleas, (b) by means of merchandise grain, chiefly which may contain rats as well as fleas. It is not yet established which of these two agencies is the more important, but recent work, both in India and the Far East, has emphasised the importance of grain as a vehicle for the transmission of infection.
- (6) In comparatively few places in India does plague infection survive the adverse conditions of the non-epidemic season: such places are usually either (a) large towns or (b) places which have been infected late in the epidemic season.
- (7) In places which have suffered from repeated and severe epidemics of plague, the rats have become less susceptible to plague than are the rats in places which have remained plague-free or have suffered but slightly.

21. These conclusions have been arrived at after much careful painstaking research and constitute a great advance on the knowledge of plague, which was available when, in 1896, it first appeared in Bombay. They point, apparently, to a simple solution of the plague problem—no rats no plague. But this solution is not attainable unless the population concerned is convinced of the danger of living in close association with the rat and is ready to co-operate in its extermination. Unfortunately, attempts at rat destruction by trapping or poison frequently meet with active opposition. Experience in India suggests that owing to the excessive fecundity of the animals, general rat destruction, even when applied to extensive areas, gives only a temporary reduction of rat infestation and has a limited sphere of usefulness as an anti-plague measure.

22. In one direction, however, well directed efforts at rat destruction may prove useful. In each epidemic a number of places are infected late in the season and in certain of these plague survives the non-epidemic period only to break out in a virulent form when the conditions of spread again become more favourable. These localities are potential foci of extensive infection. It would seem important to concentrate the energies of the plague preventive staff on them in well organised schemes of rat destruction carried out during the quiescent period before the commencement of the next epidemic season.

23. Much can be done, indirectly, to reduce the number of rats in towns and villages, by diminishing their food supply. In any place the number of rats is in proportion to the quantity of food which they can obtain. Efficient scavenging and the protection of food-stuffs from the depredations of rats are important from this point of view. The markets, grain stores, and shops, in most parts of India, are so placed and constructed as to give food and shelter to large numbers of rats. Experiments are being carried out with a view to discovering the best practical means of disinfecting grain stores and godowns. It is not practicable at present to remove grain markets and godowns outside towns, to prevent them from being used as dwellings for men, to insist on solid masonry buildings, or to prohibit the stabling of horses and cattle in the precincts of dwelling houses. But these measures and the storage of grain in bulk instead of in bags may, with the progress of education, hereafter enter the zone of practicability. The exclusion of rats from houses is important. In several provinces experiments with different types of so-called rat-proof houses have been made with varying degrees of success. The results suggest that no form of house could remain rat-free for long in India owing to the habits of the people. Even were this not the case it would obviously be impracticable, for financial reasons, to render dwelling houses in the towns and villages of India rat-proof on anything like a large scale. On the other hand, the individual can protect himself by providing his house with masonry floors and walls and windows enough to give ample light and air to every room and by preventing accumulations of rubbish amongst which rats can build their nests. The rat requires shelter for breeding, is mainly nocturnal in its habits and prefers darkness to light.

24. Three other measures remain to be considered—evacuation, disinfection and inoculation. The evacuation of all houses in large towns, on the occurrence of rat mortality therein or human plague cases in adjacent dwellings, is rarely possible, but in villages and parts of smaller towns it is a valuable means of checking an epidemic of plague. Disinfection to be efficacious should be directed against the rat and the rat-flea. It is of little value when it leaves both untouched. The practical objections to compulsory inoculations with anti-plague vaccine on a large scale continue; but the safety and efficiency of inoculation as a personal preventive measure against infection has been abundantly proved, and in certain areas the prejudice against it appears to be diminishing. The Government of India desire that every facility should be afforded to any one wishing to obtain this protection for himself or his family and they commend to local Governments the employment of carefully selected private practitioners to this end.

CHOLERA.

25. Cholera is now much less prevalent than formerly, but frequently occasion severe epidemics and still remains a constant cause of mortality. Epidemics have in several recent cases been traced to pilgrims returning from places of religious pilgrimage, at which there had been no recognised outbreak of the disease. In 1912, Major Greig was deputed to make a special investigation of the whole subject. That investigation, which still continues, has added to knowledge regarding the propagation of cholera and has established the fact that not only cholera convalescents, but also healthy persons who have been in contact with cholera cases, can act as "carriers" of the disease. It has also been shown that the germs of the disease can be recovered from a patient's dejecta kept under natural conditions for a variable but frequently considerable period, and that flies may play an important part in the dissemination of infection. These observations, while in no way opposed to previous knowledge that cholera is a water-borne disease, accentuate the importance of careful and thorough conservancy.

INFANT MORTALITY.

26. No summary of public health is complete without a reference to infant mortality. In 1911, of 4,752,152 male children and 4,457,551 females born in India, 1,016,823 males and 873,677 females died. In other words, about one-fifth of the children born died within the first year of their life. It is difficult to arrive at the actual causes of this high rate of mortality. The figures at the disposal of Government are often of doubtful accuracy, and the comparison of figures from different localities is frequently fallacious. On a broad view of the causes of infant mortality may thus be summarised: (1) malaria operating both directly on the infant and indirectly through the mother; (2) diseases due to insanitary surroundings and exposure to infection especially through the medium of flies; (3) diseases due to ignorance on the part of the mother with regard to the feeding and care of the infant; (4) accidents of child birth and diseases attendant thereon. For (3) and (4) the custom of early marriage and the primitive and insanitary methods of midwifery are largely responsible. The latter lead directly to the death of the infant from tetanus and other diseases, and indirectly increase the infant mortality by depriving children of their natural nourishment either through the death of the mother or the failure of her milk as the result of sepsis. Deficiency in the supply of cow's milk has been proved to be a predominant cause of infant mortality in India; but the question of improving both the quality and the quantity of the milk-supply without increasing its cost is engaging earnest attention (vide, paragraph 42).

It is hoped that the instruction of mothers and midwives will engage the attention of all medical women practising in India and especially interest the women's medical service which has recently been established. In some of the large cities in India, notably Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, nurse health visitors have been appointed by municipalities to visit the people in their homes and assist and instruct mothers in the elementary principles of hygiene. In Bombay, an interesting experiment has been started by Dr. Turner in the form of lectures to the midwives. Another is likely to be made under the auspices of the Indian Research Fund Association in Delhi, where it is proposed to detail two trained nurses for work as health visitors.

VITAL STATISTICS.

27. The course of sanitary reform is much impeded by the want of complete and accurate vital statistics. Without them it is difficult to gauge the effects of sanitary measures or to convince people of their efficacy. The difficulties in the way of improving the reporting and recording agency especially in rural areas are great; but systematic checking and supervision of returns should yield good results. Dispensary returns and voluntary notification by private medical practitioners are useful as checks but are only partial in their scope. A comprehensive scheme for the improvement of general reporting is required. The Government of India invite the attention of local Governments to the importance of the subject.

28. The Government of India recognise that differences in local conditions preclude the issue of any general instructions but they commend the following propositions for consideration:—

- (a) The reporting of vital occurrences should not be left exclusively to the municipal staff; reporting by the head of the household also should be insisted on. The two reports would then be available to check one another.
- (b) The actual registration should be done not as an extra duty but by special registrars who should, if possible, possess a medical qualification. In the case of deaths, inquiries regarding the symptoms of the deceased could then be made from the person reporting and some check on the diagnosis of the cause of death could be obtained. Many people are attended during their last illness by unqualified persons or die without medical attendance.
- (c) The registrar should be required to verify at least 10 per cent. of the reported births and deaths and this verification should, as far as possible, include all particulars such as cause, date, age, sex, place, etc.
- (d) The health officer should be in charge of the vital statistics in the town and should be responsible for supervising and checking the work.
- (e) Experiments might be made in obtaining accurate registration in typical areas by means of a special staff which would also be employed in healing the sick.

SANITARY SURVEYS.

29. Concurrently with attention to the registration of vital statistics the Government of India commend to local Governments the importance of surveys on board lines. Something has been done in this direction and valuable reports have been drawn up, giving the real health conditions of towns and particular localities and indicating the existence of any special sickness or mortality and the definite causes underlying them. The Government of India desire that systematic working plans should be drawn up where this had not already been with a view to mapping out the sanitary conditions of all the more important towns and localities in which sickness or mortality is above normal. This will occupy years of steady preparation; but as deputy sanitary commissioners are relieved of much of the routine work which at present they have to perform they should be able to carry this undertaking to a successful issue. The preparation of drainage surveys in towns in advance of needs obviates waste in the long run. In the absence of such surveys, work is often commenced in a haphazard way without due consideration of a scheme as a whole.

URBAN SANITATION.

30. Urban sanitation has, as already observed, received much attention of late years. It falls generally under four heads, viz., conservancy, water-supply, drainage, and town-planning with improvement of housing and the relief of congested areas. In the forefront of these stands conservancy.

CONSERVANCY.

31. The importance of efficient scavenging with speedy and complete removal of all night-soil and rubbish from the vicinity of habitations and its satisfactory disposal can scarcely be exaggerated. Yet probably no department of public health work is more neglected in many Indian towns. The strict rules of the caste system have for centuries relegated everything connected with this work to the outcast, and the people, as a rule, evince little if any interest in the conservancy even of their own houses. To this neglect must be attributed the plague of flies which at certain seasons is experienced in every Indian town. Apart from the discomfort which they cause flies are known to be the disseminators of many diseases, including cholera, enteric fever, tuberculosis, dysentery and diarrhoea and are largely responsible for the heavy mortality amongst infants. The all-India sanitary conferences at Madras and Lucknow drew prominent attention to the danger to health caused by the presence of these noxious insects, and the results of the recent "anti-fly" campaign at Delhi suggest that a large reduction in the number of flies is by no means an impossible task.

32. Whether incineration or shallow trenching of either of these methods of conservancy combined with water carriage is the best in any particular case will depend very largely on local conditions and customs. With the extension of drainage and sewerage systems, water carriage of all night-soil, with ultimate disposal on sewage farms, should give the best result. In the majority of towns, however, it will be long before this is generally practicable and the choice rests between incineration and trenching. Of the two methods, incineration is safer and on this account, if conditions permit, is preferable. Trenching is often thought to be more economical; but the profits obtainable from the trenching or pitting of night-soil and sale of the pondrette disappear, or are largely reduced, when the expense of carriage and supervision is taken into account. The material consideration in all cases is that the removal and disposal should be prompt. As education spreads and the number of health officers and sanitary inspectors increases, improved results may be anticipated.

WATER SUPPLY.

33. Few subjects have received more attention of late than the provision of a piped supply of filtered water in towns. Complete figures are not available but sums amounting to at least Rs. 3,51,58,267 (£2,313,886) have been spent during the last 20 years on completed schemes. Projects costing Rs. 1,40,03,438 (£938,562) are under construction and projects costing Rs. 1,14,44,750 (762,983) have been prepared and sanctioned. These figures are exclusive of the expenditure in the presidency towns and Rangoon.

34. The demand for piped and filtered water-supply grows, and is likely to grow more rapidly in future. While recognising the need for treating the question with due regard to local conditions, the Government of India offer the following general observations:—

- (a) When piped water supplies were first introduced, in the face of opposition, it was necessary that the charges should be made as low as possible. That stage has now been passed, and there appears no good reason why water-supplies should not be conducted on a business footing and the water charged for like any other commodity. An interesting discussion on the financing of water-supplies was introduced by the Hon'ble Mr. Curtis of the Madras sanitary conference.
- (b) On the whole, the provision of piped filtered water in towns has not been followed by that reduction in water-borne disease which might have been expected. This is probably due in most cases to the large number of wells, both public and private, which still remain in use. The closure of many of these wells is much to be desired, but the owners are unlikely to consent to this so long as the piped supply is intermittent and is drawn off hot or unpleasantly warm during the summer. In any case the substitution of a constant for an intermittent supply will shortly have to be considered as pipes get older and in suction declares itself. The warmth of the water is more difficult to deal with, but much might be done by burying pipes deeper in the ground and carrying house pipes inside instead of outside houses.
- (c) Excessive wastage is common and causes not only an unnecessary burden on the municipality but frequently also a defective supply in the higher portions of the distribution. The employment of a regular waste-detection staff has in most cases been found to make for economy and efficiency.

DRAINAGE.

35. Drainage schemes, on modern lines, are the basis of all sanitary improvement in urban areas. The demand for them is scarcely less than that for piped water and is steadily on the increase. As in the case of water-supply complete figures are not available but the known expenditure during the last twenty years has been considerable and is now rapidly increasing. The expenditure on completed works outside the presidency towns and Rangoon during that period amounted to Rs. 97,65,049 (£651,008) whereas the cost of the works under construction is estimated at Rs. 1,54,20,502 (£1,028,083). In the beginning precedence over drainage was given to piped water-supply but experience has demonstrated the advantage of introducing both concurrently. Without drainage there is no means of carrying off the surplus water and without piped water-supply it is difficult to flush the drains properly.

38. When drainage schemes on modern lines were first started in this country there seems to have been a bias against the use of sewers and, wherever possible, open drains were adopted. Experience has shown that the preference for the open drain, and the fear that sewer would give excessive trouble, were not well-founded. On the contrary, much of the advantage of a drainage system is lost if only open drains are used, as the old system of hand-carriage latrines has to be continued. Moreover, economy in establishment is possible only in the case of a sewerage system.

EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

39. The Government of India desire to invite the attention of local Government to the importance of providing adequate facilities for the isolation of cases of epidemic diseases. The isolation of individuals suffering from infectious diseases is often desirable and sometimes necessary, and it would seem desirable to have in every important municipality a small well-built segregation hospital in charge of a qualified medical practitioner, who might be one of the medical registrars for vital statistics.

A revised set of regulations under the Indian Ports Act for the prevention of the spread of infectious and contagious diseases is under consideration.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD AND DRUGS.

40. The adulteration of food and drugs is common and has an important bearing on public health. Provisions for dealing with adulteration of food-stuffs exist in most municipal enactments in India, but these are confined to municipal areas and are restricted in their operation. Bombay and the United Provinces have special laws dealing with the question. The Government of India have recently inquired from local Governments as to the desirability of legislation, imperial or provincial, on the subject. The question is not free from difficulty, as, besides the necessity of fixing standards, a competent staff of analysts and inspectors is necessary, and for any real success the co-operation of the people is required.

ADULTERATION OF MILK.

41. The adulteration of milk is almost universal in Indian bazaars and a large proportion of the milk consumed is contaminated. In most cities, the milk-supply is in the hands of men ignorant of the elements of sanitation and addicted to uncleanly practices. Moreover, the milk when stored and in transit to market is liable to contamination in several ways. On the other hand, the price of milk is already very high and the problem of improving the purity without increasing the price to such an extent as to cause hardship to the poorer classes is a difficult one.

The Lucknow sanitary conference recommended that the development of the dairy industry and the organisation of the transport and sale of milk should ordinarily precede measures of sanitary restriction; and that there should be mutual help and co-operation between sanitarians, milk dealers and the agricultural department. That department is already considering how to develop a profitable dairy animal, a measure largely dependent on suitable and regular feeding. While local authorities should clearly insist on cleanliness in the conditions under which cattle are milked and dairy produce is manufactured, stored, or transported in towns, the removal of cattle so far as possible to cheap, healthy and natural surroundings outside cities is a measure greatly to be commended. The establishment of co-operative dairy farms in the United Provinces, the Central Provinces, and elsewhere has so far been attended with success and should be encouraged. Attempts might well be made to induce gwalas to organise milk production outside cities and its transport to market on co-operative principles. These methods prove successful, it may be possible without raising the price to bring the milk-supply under necessary sanitary control. The Government of India commend the whole question to the early attention of local Governments. With regard to milk standards, conditions in India differ from those in Europe, and chemical standards should be fixed by persons possessing adequate local knowledge and experience, and with due regard to local conditions.

TOWN-PLANNING AND RELIEF OF CONGESTED AREAS.

42. While much has been done to provide drainage and pure water in large cities, there can be little hope of improving their sanitary condition permanently until measures are taken to relieve congested areas and to provide broader streets and buildings more open to sun and air. The constitution in 1898 of the Improvement Trust in Bombay marked a notable step in advance. By the end of 1912-1913, the Bombay Trust had incurred an expenditure of Rs. 488 lakhs (£3,253,333) towards schemes aggregating Rs. 802 lakhs (£5,346,666). Broad roads have been driven through the heart of the city, slum areas have been abolished; and dwelling provided for the accommodation of the poorer classes. The Calcutta Improvement Trust constituted in 1911 is now developing similar schemes for the improvement and development of Calcutta. Funds for these great projects have been provided mainly from local taxation and municipal contributions, supplemented in the case of each city by an imperial grant of Rs. 50 lakhs (£333,333) and, in the case of Calcutta, by a recurring grant of Rs. 1½ lakhs (£10,000) for 60 years. In other provinces, similar works have been carried out on a smaller scale in the larger towns, notably in the United Provinces and at Lucknow.

There has been, as already stated, an increasing desire on the part of the well-to-do in cities to escape from their present insanitary surroundings and to obtain houses in more open positions outside city limits. In India, as in England, municipalities are confronted by the difficulty of obtaining land for town extensions except at prohibitive cost. The multiplicity of small owners in this country, and the impossibility of persuading them to co-operate, render any considered and comprehensive plan of town extension impossible in the absence of some controlling and co-ordinating authority armed with powers of compulsion. In their letter of 26th July 1912, the Government of India indicated their opinion that where land on the outskirts of a town was mainly agricultural and could be acquired cheaply en bloc, the local body would probably be well advised to purchase it outright.

43. Such a policy, however, will, for financial reasons, often be impossible on a large scale. Where the cost of acquisition is prohibitive, control may be preferable to acquisition and in their circular letter of the 26th July 1912 the Government of India drew attention to the features of a scheme under discussion in the Bombay Presidency which has now been incorporated in a Town Planning Bill. The principal feature of this scheme is that the cost is apportioned and recovered from the various persons and interests concerned in the shape of a development contribution calculated in proportion to the increased value which is estimated to accrue to each plot on the completion of the scheme, the tax that can be levied from any one owner being limited, as in England, to one-half of the betterment estimated to accrue. The local body remains liable for any excess cost not covered by the tax. Such a scheme involves taking powers to pool and redistribute small holdings in a form suitable for building purposes. It has the advantage of reducing capital outlay while securing for public purposes a share in the profits of the transaction. The Government of India have also invited an examination of the provisions of municipal acts for dealing with insanitary areas and have inquired whether the limitations contained in the English Housing Acts on excessive compensation in areas, which, after due inquiry, have been declared insanitary, might not be introduced in India. The first step towards improvement is to fix a standard of light and ventilation suitable to local conditions; the next is to ensure that adequate building regulations providing for this standard are introduced by all municipal bodies and that a competent executive staff is appointed with full powers to carry them out. The whole question will be reviewed when the replies of local Governments have been received.

RURAL SANITATION.

44. The difficulties which surround rural sanitation in India are well-known and persistent. Contaminated sites, polluted water-supply, badly constructed and insanitary dwellings, the habits and prejudices of the people raise obstacles to progress which in most provinces are still well-nigh insuperable. The Government of India have informed local Governments that they are at liberty to expend a portion of the imperial grants for urban sanitation on rural sanitation, provided practical schemes for this purpose are forthcoming; but they have postponed special imperial grants for this purpose until such schemes are more generally advanced. They fully appreciate the enormous importance of rural sanitation in a country which is mainly agricultural. Past experience and present conditions, however, indicate that the subject is still one for experiment on lines conceived to attract the co-operation of the people. Without their cordial help no sanitary staff could effectually deal with the village sanitation of the two hundred and twenty millions who inhabit rural areas in British India. The danger of employing low-paid and imperfectly trained subordinates in a matter so closely affecting village-life is now generally recognized and should never be out of mind.

NEED FOR EDUCATION.

45. The diffusion of sound education will, however, remain the most potent and penetrating instrument of sanitation among a population which still views it for the most part with hostility, or unconcern. The claims of hygiene as part of their educational policy were recognized by the Government of India in their educational resolution of the 21st February 1913. It may be hoped that before many years have passed educational institutions will have become missions of sanitation in their own vicinity and beyond. Meanwhile, some simple knowledge of the more common infectious diseases may with advantage be diffused. The difficulties are considerable and systematic organisation is required. The India branch of the St. John Ambulance Association has offered its valuable assistance. In several provinces pictorial leaflets are distributed and simple lantern lectures and demonstrations are given at fairs and other large gatherings, while in Bombay popular lectures to teachers, students and others have been organised by Major Glen Liston. The Indian Research Fund Association has decided to establish a central bureau where lanterns and lantern slides, pictures, and skeleton lectures can be stocked for issue on loan. Much may be done by utilising the services of municipal health officers and medical subordinates attached to travelling dispensaries and by enlisting the sympathies and active help of medical women, private medical practitioners, and private philanthropic agencies and persons. Sanitation must begin at home and as the Hon'ble Sir Pardee Lums and Colonel Firth, the former on the civil, the latter on the military side, have pointed out, there will never be any real advance in domestic or personal hygiene until the women of the country realise its advantages and necessity. The encouragement of medical women to preach the gospel of health inside the zenana and to organise purdah parties for simple lantern demonstration lectures and the employment of nurse visitors as in Delhi, Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, are to be commended. Periodical local conferences and publications similar to the recently issued by the Bombay Government entitled "Some recent sanitary developments in the Bombay Presidency" are very useful and keep the question of sanitation before the public mind. Other methods for preparing people to combat preventable disease and premature mortality may suggest themselves. There is room for many workers in the sanitary field. The Governor-General in Council appeals with confidence to all who have interest in the well-being of India to join with him and the local Governments in a sustained endeavour to give effect to His Imperial Majesty's most gracious wish that the homes of his Indian subjects may be brightened and their labour sweetened by the spread of knowledge with all that follows in its train, a higher level of thought, of comfort and of health.

The Ulster Plot.

MR. CHURCHILL'S REPLY TO CHARGES.

REPLYING in the House of Commons on the 28th April to Mr. Anstey Chamberlain's speech in moving the Opposition resolution demanding a full inquiry into the Ulster plot, Mr. Churchill, who was received with loud Ministerial cheers, said:—This is a vote of censure and a demand for a judicial inquiry. In all the circumstances I venture to say it is the most audacious vote of censure (Ministerial cheers) and the most impudent demand from an Opposition (loud Ministerial cheers) for a judicial inquiry to which our records can provide a parallel. The first maxim of English jurisprudence is that complainants should come into court with clean hands. (Ministerial cheers.) Here we get Sir E. Carson and Captain Craig fresh from their gun-running exploit (loud Ministerial cheers and Opposition interruptions, and cries of "We don't tell lies about it.")

Mr. Churchill was unable to proceed in the uproar. Ministerialists shouted across to members of the Opposition, and Sir E. Carson leaning forward in his seat, appeared to be shouting across the table to Mr. Churchill.

Sir E. Carson: You behave like a cad.

Mr. MacCallum Scott (L. Glasgow, Bridgeton,) (rising amid general uproar): Mr. Speaker, I desire on a point of order to call your attention to the conduct of the right hon. gentleman, the member for Dublin University, who has been shouting across the floor of the House to members on this side that they are cads. (Derisive Opposition laughter.)

The Speaker: It is a most improper expression, I do not know whether the hon. member was one of those who were shouting offensive expressions (Opposition cheers), but he will not deny that several of his colleagues did. I hope the right hon. gentleman will not repeat the observation, but under the circumstances I do not propose to call upon him to withdraw it. (Opposition cheers.)

Sir Edward Carson: May I say, Sir, that I listened patiently through all these discussions as I always do and it is only when I am taunted from the other side of the House that I use these expressions. If I have said anything disorderly I regret it, but I shall not be taunted from the other side without asserting myself. (Opposition cheers.)

Mr. Churchill: I am quite entitled to review the curious position occupied by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues in coming here fresh from their exploits in Ireland to demand a judicial inquiry into the conduct of those responsible for the maintenance of law and order. (Ministerial cheers.) The right hon. gentleman who has just sat down made a very long speech which was altogether out of date (Ministerial laughter and cheers.) He began by admitting this. He said, "I have not to deal with subsequent facts." Subsequent facts he clearly sees are fatal to the motion. (Ministerial cheers.) But are we quite sure they are subsequent facts. (Ministerial cheers.) It is very convenient, no doubt, to represent that after the revelations of the fiendish plot it was necessary for the law abiding people of Ulster to obtain weapons to protect themselves from such horrible machinations (Ministerial laughter), and that what took place at Larne and other places on Friday night last was the answer to the events which are now under discussion. I do not think that this is the case at all. (Ministerial cheers.) On the 18th February—a month before we had made those preparations to protect our depôts—the right hon. and learned gentleman (Sir Edward Carson) speaking at the Cannon Street Hotel said: "They were daily entering into commitments of thousands of pounds and he himself in the last few days—it was no harm to confess it—the right hon. gentleman has always been perfectly frank—"

Mr. Rawlinson (U. Cambridge University): He has always told the truth.

Mr. Churchill: It is quite out of the hon. gentleman's power to insult me. He himself—it was not harm to confess it (went on Mr. Churchill continuing his quotation)—had authorised an expenditure of at least sixty to eighty thousand pounds toward their defence if it became immediately necessary.

CONSIGNMENTS OF ARMS.

I think it is quite clear that the large consignments of arms which have lately been landed in such a lawless fashion were part of the policy which the right hon. gentleman was carrying out before the Government even embarked on its military precautions. (Ministerial cheers.) A great many hard words are used about us. Mr. Chamberlain used the expression "criminal" in regard to us, and his supporters in the Press have used extraordinary language. But we can support these accusations with composure. We have not broken the law, and we are not engaged in breaking the law. (Ministerial cheers.) Anyone who is familiar with the law knows perfectly well that there are half a dozen statutes, some of them of the gravest character, which are being openly flouted and defied at the present time by hon. members who sit opposite us and by their followers in Ireland, and that they are being flouted and defied with the full connivance and approval of the Opposition leaders. (Ministerial cheers.) So that what we are now witnessing in this House is uncommonly like a vote of censure by the criminal classes upon the police. (Loud Ministerial laughter.)

A Unionist Member: You have not arrested the criminals.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, is that the complaint? It is that we have been too lenient? If so, that is the only accusation I am not prepared to answer. (Ministerial laughter and cheers.) I should like the House to notice that in 2 Vic., Chapter 3, the offense of using force to induce the King to change his councils or to try to intimidate or overawe either or both Houses of Parliament is placed on a level with two of the vilest crimes, namely, endeavouring to subvert the Throne of this country or to bring in a foreign enemy. (Ministerial cheers.) We have to face every day the revilings of your ferocious Press. (Ministerial laughter.) But your condemnation is contained in the statutes and the laws of the British Realm, in Acts of Parliament which have for generations and centuries been respected and enforced by the people of these Islands, and which are indeed the necessary and indispensable foundation of order by government and civilised society. (Ministerial cheers.)

Language far stronger, far crueller, than any which your most partisan speaker or your most patriotic editor—(Ministerial laughter)—has been able to introduce into speech or leading article is found on the grave and severe pages of the English Statute-book. In these circumstances we can afford to retain our composure. (Ministerial cheers.)

POSITION OF CONSERVATIVES.

But what is the position of the Conservative party in regard to events which are taking place in Ireland? The Conservative party—the party of the comfortable and the wealthy, the party of those who have most to gain by the continuance of the existing social system—here they are committed to naked revolution—(Ministerial cheers)—committed to a policy of armed violence, to the utter defiance of lawfully constituted authority—committed to tampering with the discipline of the Army and the Navy—(Ministerial cheers)—committed to obstructing the highway and the telegraphs and to overpowering the police, the coastguard, and the Customs officials—committed to smuggling in arms by moonlight—committed to tyrannical seizure of ships and to the unlawful imprisonment of the King's servants. The Conservative party as a whole are committed to that. (Loud Ministerial cheers.)

The right hon. gentleman the member for Walton (Mr. F. E. Smith) has left us in no doubt about that. Speaking at the annual dinner of the Junior Imperial League, he said: "Sir Edward Carson has taken no steps and he will take no steps, however extreme they may be, for which we shall not make ourselves responsible here as representing a majority of the English constituencies." That is their position, and while the newspapers are chuckling with nervous glee as each sorry event is recorded, while they are hurriedly collecting information as if it were news from Mexico or some other disturbed area, and bringing out special editions with the utmost satisfaction—all the time this is going on, let me point out to the Conservative party and those associated with them that there is in this country a great democracy—(cheers and counter cheers)—millions of whom are forced to live their lives under conditions which leave them stripped of all but the barest necessities, who are repeatedly urged to be patient under their misfortunes, and to wait year after year and Parliament after Parliament until in the due workings of the Constitution some satisfaction is given to their clamant needs. All the time this great audience is watching—(Ministerial cheers),—and is learning from you, from those who have hitherto called themselves the party of law and order, how much they care for law and how much they value order if it stands in the way of anything they like. (Ministerial cheers.)

THE PREMIER'S OFFER.

If I am to go back in this controversy I would like to begin at what I must consider the turning point in the Home Rule discussion—I mean the rejection of the Prime Minister's offer of the 9th March. It was necessary to Mr. Chamberlain's argument that he should make out that there had been no rejection. But he quoted with approval the expression "hypocritical sham" which had been applied to the Prime Minister's proposal. He said: "The Government had made an advance, and we recognised it." How did they recognise it? The very next day Sir Edward Carson wrote: "It is clear to my mind that so far as our preparations are concerned the pronouncement of the Government, if anything, necessitates a still more forward movement." That is what Mr. Chamberlain describes as the Government making an advance and the Conservative party recognising it. (Laughter.) I cannot understand why when that pronouncement was made by the Prime Minister the spokesmen of the party opposite could not have said: "Although this is not what we require, it constitutes the greatest step forward towards a settlement that has ever been made." Had that language been used I venture to think the threads would not have been severed which have been interrupted. The Government made the greatest offer it was in their power to make, and it was summarily and incontinently rejected. What were the results of that act? It was perfectly clear that there was no possibility of settlement so long as one party in the House believed that it had only got to go on bullying the other and in the end the other would be incapable of taking an effective steps to maintain its authority.

While one party in a dispute is prepared to go to all extremes, and it is its firm belief that the other will in no circumstances take the necessary action to defend its rights and discharge its duties, there is no possibility of any effective parley between them. (Ministerial cheers.) From the moment that the declaration of the Prime Minister was made, there was no more question of the coercion of Ulster by the Government. Six years must intervene before the question of the inclusion of Ulster needed to arise again.

COERCION OF ULSTER.

There was no question of coercing Ulster. The question was of our preventing Ulster from coercing us. (Ministerial cheers.) In the differences which remained in regard to Ulster, taken by themselves, there was no foothold of foundation for civil war. It is clear that those who were preparing civil war had other purposes besides Ulster in their mind. (Ministerial cheers.) They were preparing to defeat the general policy of Home Rule, and they were preparing to subvert the regular system of parliamentary government in this country. Whatever sympathy we may have for Ulster, there is no room for concession or weakness in face of a challenge of that kind. (Ministerial cheers.) If parliamentary government is exposed to challenge in this country we are bound to take up the challenge and fight it out to the very end. (Renewed cheers.) Nothing would be more disastrous than that hon. gentlemen opposite should suppose that they and their Ulster friends are the only people in this country who are prepared to risk their lives. (Ministerial cheers.) The supreme issue lies here, but the actual events are taking place on the Irish stage.

What was the situation in Ireland the second week in March? There was an Orange army, strong and efficient, no doubt. No one can do more justice to it than has been done to it by its own friends. (Ministerial laughter.) Scattered about Ulster were the scanty police and Military forces of the Crown, and depôts of arms and ammunition of great consequence to the growing illegal military force. We had, of course, police and military reports accumulated over a long period of time; we had the advice of general officers, and we had many other sources of information as to what was proceeding. We had Sir Edward Carson's statement as to the large sums of money spent on arms and ammunition.

MILITARY PRECAUTIONS.

We had therefore to survey the whole military situation in Ireland with all its possibilities, actual and contingent. That survey comprised three separate spheres. First of all there was the question of the battle squadron with attendant ships which it was decided in the Cabinet on the 11th March should be stationed upon the west coast of Scotland with view to being at hand should intervention in Irish disorders become necessary or desirable. (Ministerial cheers and Opposition counter cheers.) I have never attempted to conceal the fact. Will any one say it was an improper or improvident proceeding on the part of the Government. That is entirely separate from the second sphere of our inquiry that relating to the defence of the military depôts.

Mr. Chamberlain has spent a great deal of time in trying to make mystery, obscurity and difficulty out of what is perfectly clear and plain. Those large stores ranged from thirty to eighty-five tons of small arm ammunition scattered about in entirely unprotected positions. They had as guards very small bodies of infantry, largely recruits and old soldiers, and those men were in some cases almost equally divided between Protestants and Catholics. There was every possibility of these stores being a temptation, either to a serious movement by responsible people or to being the prey of some spontaneous and irresponsible movement. Then there were three batteries of field artillery at Dundalk, and although the Orange army has since replenished its rifles and ammunition, it is believed to be deficient in field artillery; the military authorities pointed out to us that that artillery, weakly guarded, was the most dangerously exposed part of our dispositions. We therefore moved two battalions of troops to reinforce those various points, and we also sent General Macready to Belfast in order that he might concert and co-ordinate measures by which the scattered police and military on the spot might combine in the event of a general hostile movement being taken against them by the right hon. and learned gentleman (Sir Edward Carson) and his army. (Ministerial cheers and laughter.)

The only use of ships in connection with this movement was which the scattered police and military on the spot might combine the event of a general hostile movement being taken against them by the right hon. and learned gentleman (Sir Edward Carson) and his army. (Ministerial cheers and laughter.)

The only use of ships in connection with this movement was that two scouts were used to carry two companies to Carrickfergus in order not to rail them through Belfast, which it was thought might lead to trouble. That is the whole of the movements authorised by the Cabinet or by any member of the Cabinet. Does anyone say, in view of the desperate steps now taken to obtain arms by the Orange leaders, that the measure that we then proposed, which I have unfolded to the House, was inappropriate or premature or unnecessary in any respect? (Loud Ministerial cheers.)

STUDY OF CONTINGENCIES.

Now I come to the third subject in our general survey of the military position in Ireland. We made a free and confidential survey with our military advisers, including the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, into the general situation, actual and prospective, not only in Ulster, but in Ireland as a whole. It is a recognised process of all military departments to study effectively all contingencies, however improbable, that may be reasonably apprehended. In this case an element of greater reality was imparted into our consideration by the fact that these small definite movements had been authorised and were going to take place, and that the General charged with them believed that they might easily entail far larger and far graver consequences. We did not accept his view, and the event has proved that we were right in the judgment and measures we took of the whole situation. Sir A. Paget was also right to be over-cautious.

I am not going into details of confidential discussions which we held with Sir A. Paget and other Generals, nor am I going to give plans and movements which would have been appropriate to a situation which has not yet arisen, which probably will never arise, but which, nevertheless, may arise. I think it is a very cool request—(Ministerial cheers)—on the part of gentlemen engaged in planning military operations against the organised Government of the State, and in arming, as they tell us, 100,000 men with rifles and ammunition to shoot down the King's servants. (Ministerial cheers.) I think it is a very cool request to ask to be informed what, in each of these particular eventualities are the precise military or police measures which will be adopted against them. (Ministerial cheers.)

Of course, my responsibilities are limited, but I am anxious to take the fullest responsibility for everything I have said or done either publicly or confidentially in this matter, but, broadly speaking, the contingencies we considered were these:—

First of all an armed attack upon our small depôts or on the forces marching to protect them, including the guns at Dundalk.

Secondly, we considered the measures which would be appropriate and necessary if the Provisional Government were set up in Belfast either consequent upon these small movements we were making or at a later period.

We considered that under two heads—whether that Government would be set up bloodlessly or whether it was set up after the murder of a number of police and others. (Ministerial cheers.) No movements of any kind were authorised other than those I have described, but in view of the fact that Sir A. Paget thought that grave events might follow from these movements, we gave him to understand that large reinforcements would be sent him if these contingencies arose, and he left with the confidence that even if the most extreme and improbable contingencies arose he would be properly supported by the Government, as he has been and will, if necessary, be supported. (Ministerial cheers.)

DUTY OF THE EXECUTIVE.

Does anybody dispute the propriety of that? If British troops marching on the King's highway were shot down and slain by rebel rifles if the guns at Dundalk had been attacked before they could have been covered by infantry, if the 85 tons of ammunition at Carrickfergus had been assailed, it would be the absolute duty of the Executive Government with every man or gun they could command. (Ministerial cheers and counter Opposition cheers.)

It would be the duty of the military department to be fully prepared to execute any orders they might receive from the Government, and so far as I am concerned, I wish to make it perfectly plain that if British troops are attacked and fired on and loss of life occur to them, I would take every measure within my power that I have authority for to secure that the persons making that attack shall receive the most condign chastisement—(Ministerial cheers)—at the time and are afterwards proceeded against with the full rigor of the law. (Renewed Ministerial cheers and counter Opposition cheers.)

RESORT TO FORCE.

Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that these things could never have happened—they did not happen; they never could happen. Then in that case nothing could happen on our part either. The use of force rests with them. It does not rest with us. They are the masters of the situation in that respect.

We shall not use force till force is first used against the representatives of law and order. We shall in no circumstances use more legal force than is necessary to maintain or restore order.

Best, therefore, they take life first their lives will not in any circumstances be in danger. But if they do, we are bound to use all the forces at our disposal, and to take all necessary measures to secure the vindication of the law and the repression of disorder. (Ministerial cheers.)

From that there is absolutely no escape. Whatever mistakes hon. gentlemen opposite may make, do not let them imagine that they are dealing with a Government or with individuals who will flinch from doing their duty in that respect. (Ministerial cheers.) The Government have an absolute right, if they choose, at any time to make movements far in excess of those that have been made. We have a perfect right at any time we think fit to put 40,000 or 50,000 men in Ulster, to begin the arrest of leaders, the seizure of arms, and the general prevention of drilling. (Ministerial cheers.) We have always rejected the idea of such measures, and we do not consider, and have not at any time considered, that they would be wise or appropriate in the circumstances with which we had so far to deal. I am very anxious indeed that no words should come from me or from any member of the Government which would seem to admit for a moment that we limit our rights to dispose of His Majesty's forces in the King's Dominions in any way we choose to maintain law and order. (Ministerial cheers and Opposition counter cheers.)

Mr. A. Chamberlain has accused us of having wished to seize strategic points. A pretty pass we have come to when we are told that British troops may not march about within the United Kingdom. (Ministerial cheers.) I did not believe at the time that, these definite precautionary measures would provoke an outbreak nor did they. (Hear, hear.) The movement of troops by sea in order to avoid going through Belfast was only part of careful measures we took to prevent it being possible to bring armed opposition to bear upon these small bodies or small movements while they were actually in process of taking place.

TALK OF CIVIL WAR.

All this talk of civil war has come from the party opposite. For the last two years we have been forced to threats of civil war.

What do they mean by civil war? Do they think it would be a war in which only one side would take part—all dazzling exploits and brilliant gun-running on the side of rebellion and nothing but fiendish plots on the side of the Government? (Opposition cheers.)

Do they really suppose they will be conducting a campaign against the Government and the Crown in the field and at the same time asking the Government and Ministers awkward questions about their military operations? (Ministerial cheers.) A sense of humour ought at least to have saved them from that. (Laughter.)

I do not believe that rebellion or civil war will come. I wish to make it perfectly clear—that if rebellion comes we shall put it down (Ministerial cheers)—and that if it comes to civil war we shall do our best to conquer in that war. But there will be neither rebellion nor civil war unless it is the making of the Opposition. (Ministerial cheers.)

Reference has been made to my Bradford speech, to which I adhere strictly. I said that if Ulster sought peace and fair play she could find it, that if she extended the hand of friendship it would be grasped by Liberals and her Nationalist countrymen in all good faith and good will. But if there was no wish for peace, and if the Government and Parliament of this great country were to be exposed to menace and sinister influences of a revolution, then we should go forward and put it down. (Ministerial cheers.) I say so still.

DESIRE FOR A SETTLEMENT.

I will venture to ask the House once more at this moment in our difficulties to consider whether we are going. I ask the House to consider whether we ought not to try to find even at this period to make some final effort to reach a better solution. Apart from the dangers which exist at home, let us look at the consequences abroad. (Cheers.)

Mr. R. Hunt (U., Ludlow): Who brought it about? (Ministerial cries of "You.")

Mr. Churchill: Anxiety is caused in every friendly country by the belief that for the time being Great Britain cannot act. The high mission of the country is thought to be in abeyance, and the balance of Europe appears for the time to be deranged. Of course, foreign countries never really understand us. They do not know that at the touch of external difficulties or menace all these affairs of internal controversy would disappear and we should be brought into line.

Why cannot men form some new basis of co-operation in vital things? Sir E. Carson is running great risks in strife. Why not run some risk for peace. The key is in his hands. Any day some event may happen which will condemn us all to a continuance of this struggle and shatter perhaps irretrievably the greatness of our country. Let the right hon. gentlemen consider whether he will not run some risk for peace. In spite of the partisanship of our politics and conflicting party interests, peace with honour is not beyond the reach of all. Tomorrow it may be gone for ever.

I am going to run some little risk upon my own account in what I am going to say. Why cannot Sir E. Carson say boldly, "Give me the amendments to the Home Rule Bill; I ask for to safeguard the dignity and interests of Protestant Ulster, and in return I will use all my influence and good will to make Ireland an integral unit in the Federal system." (Ministerial cheers.) If the right hon. gentleman used language of that kind in a spirit of sincerity it would go far to transform the political situation, and I firmly believe that procession of hideous and hateful moves and counter-moves which we are forced to discuss, and that hateful avenue down which we have looked too long, would give place to a bright prospect which would bring honour and not discredit to all concerned, and would save these islands from the evils for which our children will hold us accountable. (Loud Ministerial cheers.)

of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1918, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only 13s. 4d.. Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

bears witness to the ever-growing demand for our products for Cricket, Tennis, Hockey and all games. Sportsmen realize that "the Perfecta" quality is unequalled. Graceful in design, they are lightly yet strongly made, giving pleasure to every user.

At the same time we make other qualities—to suit every pocket and can surely please you. Many hundreds of Clubs and thousands of individual players are using our goods to-day.

The Week.

Albania.

London, May 26.

Italy urgently desires the despatch of an international force to Durazzo, France and Russia are acquiescent. Austria-Hungary does not oppose the idea. Great Britain, on the otherhand, is disinclined to it and has not replied to the suggestion. Germany likewise has not answered.

London, May 27.

The International force at Skutari being insufficient, a proposal has since been made to send an International expedition to Albania. The Powers forming the Triple Entente appear, however, unwilling.

Rome, May 27.

In the Chamber yesterday, Marquis Di San Giuliano, dealing with the situation in Albania, said that other countries at the outset of their independence had overcome greater difficulties. He hoped Albania would do the same. The insurrection was partly social, partly agrarian and partly democratic. It was also the outcome of Musulman fears of predominance of a Christian minority. Essad Pasha had undertaken not to return to Albania without the permission of the Powers. The Marquis added that he had had an active exchange of views with Count Berchtold on the situation, which had inspired mutual confidence and loyalty. The results were agreed on the necessity for consolidating Albania and the authority of the Prince. Previous decisions with regard to Epirus could not be modified. They would do the utmost to assent to the despatch of an international force to Durazzo from Skutari.

Greece.

Washington, May 29.

The Secretary for the Navy has submitted to the Naval Committee of the Senate a proposal to sell for original cost the battleships 'Idaho' and 'Mississippi' to a foreign Power, understood to be Greece. Mr. Daniels made a speech, in which he said that the vessels were only useful for harbour defence and the proceeds of their sale would almost suffice for the construction of an additional dreadnought.

Anglo-Italian Relations.

London, May 27.

Marquis Di San Giuliano, in a long statement regarding Anglo-Italian relations in Eastern Mediterranean, dwelt on the extremely cordial and loyal attitude of Great Britain in the matter of railways in Asia. He explained the details of an agreement whereby Italians obtain railway concessions southwards of the Smyrna-Aidin line, and the British, northward thereof.

Egypt.

London, May 27.

Lord Kitchener's report on the condition of Egypt has been issued. He refers to the complete tranquility of the past year and anticipates years of uninterrupted progress and development. He has every confidence in the commonsense of Egyptians and hopes that representatives in the New Assembly have learned the lesson that noisy extremists and outside political influences must be eliminated in the interests of the improvement of the masses and the progress of the country.

Referring to sanitary conditions in Egypt Lord Kitchener points out that the people no longer object to isolation for infectious diseases. Notification is now general and concealment is an exception. Returning pilgrims now come voluntarily for medical examination. Plague is now well under control and appears to be yielding to steady campaign against it. Lord Kitchener suggests that an elementary primer on Hygiene be used as a text-book in all village schools. The old soldiers of the Egyptian Army, says His Lordship, would probably make suitable sanitary inspectors. In view of high infant mortality maternity schools have been established and midwives trained under qualified English matrons. There is a growing demand for cotton seed from Government which is being distributed to cultivators.

Anglo-Persian Agreement.

London, May 26.

A Blue-Book gives the details of the Anglo-Persian Oil Agreement. The Admiralty memorandum in the Book indicates the importance of providing fuel for the Navy, which it says, is absolutely necessary to secure full efficiency of the Navy. The memorandum points out that it is, therefore, important to secure the maintenance of at least one large British Oil Company, having independent control and considerable supplies and bound to Government by financial and contractual obligations. The prices at which oil itself has been obtained has been kept secret, the supply contract being regarded as confidential in the interests of the public.

The Report of the Committee of experts, presided over by Rear-Admiral Sir E. J. W. Slade, strongly favours Government action. It remarks on the influence of the Anglo-Persian Company which, it says, has increased with the general tranquility of the district. The Committee points out, however, that it would be wrong to assume that there would never be a relapse in the event of an outbreak of lawlessness among the tribes. The situation would present certain difficulties which, though serious, would not be insurmountable.

Technical Scholarships.

Simla, May 27.

The Government of India have this year sanctioned the award of ten State Technical Scholarships to the following candidates for a course of training in Europe in the subjects noted against each:—(1) Mr. D. M. Analsadvala, Sizing and Weaving; (2) Mr. P. R. Udawadia, Architecture and building construction. He will undergo a training for two years in India and then proceed to Europe for a half-year to complete his training; (3) Mr. Upendra Nath Banerji, Mechanical Engineering; (4) O. D'Souza, Electrical Engineering; (5) Mr. Bashir-ud-din Ahmad, Municipal and Sanitary Engineering; (6) Mr. Arjan Das, Textile Industry; (7) Mr. W. Sorby, Mechanical and Electrical Engineering; (8) Mr. Baidai Sartan Bhargava, Mining; (9) Mr. Kasi Nath Saikui, Paper Pulp Industry; (10) Mr. Abdul Gaffoor Khan, Electrical Engineering.

London, May 28.

Vicomte James Bryce was the principal guest at dinner of the Central Asian Society last night. He gave his impressions of his recent travels. He said that Siberia was being steadily settled and that within thirty or forty years its population would probably have quadrupled itself. There was never a stranger thing in the world's history than the overthrow of the Manchu Dynasty without a voice or arm being lifted in its support. To say that it had been replaced by a Republic in an effective sense was farcical. Yuan-Shih Kai might keep going as long as he had money to pay his troops, but who would come after him if the Central Government collapsed? They might see China broken up into separate Principalities as she was two thousand years ago. This would mean great bloodshed and dislocation of trade; and the Powers should support the Central Government as affording the best chance of future peace.

South Africa.

Johannesburg, May 29.

In an interview with Ruter's representative, Mr. Polak said that the Bill amending the South African Immigration Act dealt with the two main causes of the passive resistance, namely the three-pound tax and the marriage question. He had received a telegram from Mr. Gandhi stating that it appeared to be satisfactory. In order however to comply with the requirements of the Passive Resisters, Mr. Polak said it would be necessary to get assurances from the Government that the Immigration Act would be more sympathetically administered and that due regard would be paid to vested interests in the application of gold and licensing laws. Mr. Polak further pointed out that the acceptance of the present Bill with every measure of thankfulness did not mean the abrogation of a general claim for a civil equality in South Africa. The remaining two points, namely the right of South African-born Indians to enter the Cape and the declaration on the entrance into Orange Free State Mr. Polak described, as small matters of administration.

London, May 28.

The Indian Council Bill has been printed. It provides that the number of members of the Council shall not be less than seven and not more than ten. When a vacancy in the Council has to be filled the appointee must domiciled in India, unless at least two of the existing members of the Council were at the time of their appointment domiciled in India, unless at least six of the existing members were when appointed domiciled in India or had served or resided in India for at least ten years and had not ceased to serve or reside for more than five years before their appointment. The appointee to fill the vacancy must either be domiciled in India or have so served or resided. The appointment of the Indian member shall be made from a list of persons eligible chosen by non-official members of the Legislative Councils. He will receive a salary of £1,200 with yearly allowance of £600. The Bill empowers the Secretary of State to appoint one financial expert as member of the Council on special terms. The Bill contains provision whereby the signature of the Secretary of State to an order or communication to India or an order in the United Kingdom relating to Government of India may be dispensed with. It empowers the Secretary of State to make rules for the transaction of business under various restrictions.

Allahabad, May 29.

The Pioneer's London correspondent cables:—The India Council Bill is quite short. Most of the changes have been foreshadowed in the speeches of Lord Crewe and Mr. Montagu. Addition is made to salaries bringing them to £1,200. The Indian members appointed shall in future have allowance of £600. Before appointing the financial expert on special terms the Secretary of State must record in a minute to Parliament, the terms and special reasons for the appointment. Orders sent to or made in relation to the Government of India shall not necessarily be signed by the Secretary of State when the Secretary of State in Council otherwise directs. The Rules by the Secretary of State affecting the powers to be given to the Committee or the necessity of submitting certain matters to the Council must be laid before the Parliament subject to the annulment by His Majesty in Council on a petition of either House within thirty days.

Simla, May 29.

Information which has reached Simla shows that the following are amongst the effects of the India Council Bill just introduced into the British Parliament. The pay of the members of the Council is restored to the figure at which it stood prior to 1907, viz., twelve hundred pounds annually each except for (1) the two Indian members who are now to be a permanent feature of the Council and who will get eighteen hundred pounds annually each, and (2) the financial member who may be engaged on special terms. The maximum strength of the Council is reduced from fourteen members to ten (which is the number now existing) and this number which has hitherto been the minimum will be liable to a possible reduction hereafter to seven which is the new minimum. There will not, however, be altogether a corresponding reduction in the number of members with Indian experience, the new minimum number for such members being now fixed at six against old minimum which varied between six and eight. The two Indian members will in future be selected by the Secretary of State from candidates elected by the non-official members of the Provincial and Imperial Legislative Councils in India but the precise rules for these elections have not yet been disclosed. It is also not yet known what powers, if any, of disposing of business will accompany the arrangement provided by the Bill whereby the authority to sign certain despatches may be delegated by the Secretary of State to the Committee of the Council. The extra payment to the two Indian members is of the nature of an away-from-home allowance and is on the principle whereby Europeans in India received more pay than Indians alongside them.

London, May 29.

An explanatory memorandum to India Council Bill points out that with a simpler procedure much unimportant work now occupying time of standing committees and Council would be disposed of by Secretary of State with assistance of individual members of committees to be specially nominated by him when required. Bill provides for simplification of business procedure and enable Secretary of State in Council to make rules to modify procedure prescribed in Act of 1858. Requirement of weekly meetings of Council is dispensed with and quorum has been reduced. Opportunity has been taken to enlarge in a way which experience has shown to be desirable the category of cases which may be dealt with by Secretary of State in his "secret" department without informing or consulting Council.

London, May 29.

Lord Crewe's Council Bill rejects the demand of the National Congress for a Council of nine, three being Indians elected by local legislatures. The substituted Council will have ten members, and only two Indians. These will be nominated by the Secretary of State from a panel of forty persons, chosen by non-official members of the legislatures. The Bill also extends powers to the Secretary of State to send to India secret orders without consulting the Council.—Statesman.

London, June 1.

The Times to-day publishes an article on the provisions of the new Council of India Bill by Mr. M. A. Jinnah, one of the delegates from the Indian National Congress. Mr. Jinnah describes the Bill as being most disappointing. There can be no doubt that what appears at first blush to be some sort of principle of election is to all practical purposes illusory. Large numbers of electors will be creatures of the official class and not representatives of the people. Mr. Jinnah postpones criticism of the remaining clauses pending explanation. He does not think, however, that it is desired to create a portfolio system.

Further particulars now received of the India Council Bill introduced into Parliament by Lord Crewe last Monday show that the method of election by Legislative Councils in India for nominees from whom occupants of the two seats reserved for Indian members are to be selected will be governed by Rules to be made by the Secretary of State in Council. The new scale of pay, already announced, will apply to members appointed after the passing of the Bill.

The Bill empowers the Secretary of State to fix dates for meetings of the Council, thus replacing the present arrangement under which meetings are held weekly. In future, three members will form a quorum. The Bill also extends section 27 of the Act of 1858 regarding secret orders so as to cover questions gravely affecting the internal tranquillity of India, her interests abroad or peace or security of any part of the Empire. They will enable the Secretary of State, to act in grave political matters without referring them to his Council.

Victoria, May 27.

The decision as to whether or not the passengers of "Komagata Maru" shall be deported or not cannot be reached for several days. An attempt was made last night on part of the Hindus of Vancouver to get to the vessel and take off some of those on board. This was frustrated by the vigilance of the Immigration authorities. The watch afloat has now been doubled.

Fearing weakening on the part of the authorities in Ottawa the Vancouver Board of Trade has sent a memorial to the Government demanding the exclusion of all Indian immigrants. Gurdit Singh continues in the belief that all opposition to landing comes from the cheap labour element.

Ottawa, May 28.

In the Dominion House of Commons yesterday, Government was interrogated as regards the action to be taken in the case of the Hindus, detained at Victoria on the "Komagata Maru". The Premier replied that twenty had been admitted on the ground that they were returning to Canada and several excluded as the result of physical tests. Regarding others, law and regulations would be enforced. Asked whether if an application was made for "Habeas Corpus", Government would rest its case on the ground that the Courts had no jurisdiction, Mr. Borden answered that if such an application was made Government would resist it through Counsel.

Gurdit Singh had asked for the appointment of a Royal Commission definitely to settle the rights of Hindus generally. This might be granted by Government.

Vancouver, May 29.

Hindus have offered one hundred thousand sterling in cash and property as bail for passengers by the "Komagata Maru" if the latter are allowed to land pending the decision of courts. The fight will be carried to the Privy Council. The decision of the latter has already upheld the right of the Dominion to exclude aliens; but it is not certain whether the Dominion has the right to exclude, by an order in Council British subjects who fulfill the requirements of Immigration Laws.

Victoria, May 31.

An enquiry presided over by the Immigration Superintendent will open here to-morrow to investigate the claims of the passenger on the "Komagata Maru."

The Indians will be represented by a lawyer and Gurdit Singh will meet all charter obligations to enable the "Komagata Maru" to remain, pending legal decision.

Ottawa, June 2.

Replying to a question in the Dominion House of Commons, Mr. Roche, Minister of the Interior, said that ninety of the ship-load of Hindus at Victoria had been rejected as medically unfit, and thirteen had been allowed to enter the country as being persons who had returned to Canada.

Mr. Oliver, ex-Minister of the Interior, said that the Hindus had thrown out a challenge which should be met half-way.

Mr. Roche replied that he hoped that the present law was sufficient to prevent the entry of undesirables. If it was not the law would be amended.

Mr. Borden stated that he regretted that the Hindus had made this attempt, in view of the fact that the order prohibiting the entry of artisans into British Columbia did not discriminate against Hindus in particular.

Replying to a question, he announced that the Government would, if necessary, submit the section of the Immigration Act which prevents the interference of courts with the order of the Minister of the Interior.

Victoria, June 1.

No deportations of Hindus have yet been ordered.

THE GRIMSBY BY-ELECTION.

The result of the by-election in Grimsby has undoubtedly proved very satisfactory to the Government. It is true that Mr. Tickler, the Unionist candidate, is returned; but he is returned by a majority more than 400 fewer than that which the Unionist candidate received at the previous election. It will not serve any useful purpose to over-state the significance of this fact; but it will be admitted in all quarters that it certainly shows no reaction against the Liberal policy. No effort had been spared to bring the menace of "civil war" before the electorate and Sir Edward Carson and his faithful galloper, Mr. F. E. Smith, had beaten the Ulster drum with all their incomparable fervour. The result of all this has been a substantial fall in the Tory majority. The Opposition may draw whatever comfort they can, but the country is not likely to overlook the real meaning of this by-election.

THE FINAL STAGES.

The House of Commons on Tuesday was called upon to accept a closure resolution dealing with the Home Rule Bill, the Welsh Bill and the Plural Voting Bill, all of which have passed their second reading more than once and the first two Bills three times. Mr. Asquith took the opportunity of explaining the course the Government proposes to adopt. The Plural Voting Bill, which has another year to run, requires no special treatment. As to the Welsh Bill, it is not known authoritatively whether the House of Lords mean to give it a second reading or to amend it in Committee. If they amend it, the amendments can be considered on the return of the Bill to the Commons, and there is no need to have a suggestion stage in the Commons. This explanation, obvious enough, disposes of the legend circulated once more by Mr. Balfour that under the Parliament Act no Bill can be amended. It can be amended, as the Daily News says, in precisely the way that any other Bill can be—by the consent of both Houses. The only difference is that the initiative in amending must be taken in the Lords; and as the Government can make its suggestions there as well as the Opposition, that difference is only formal. The case of the Home Rule Bill is different from those of the other two measures. It has been officially announced by the leaders of the Opposition—and Mr. Bonar Law repeated it on Tuesday—that the Home Rule Bill will be rejected by the Lords on the second reading. Under those circumstances a suggestion stage in the Commons with a debate upon it would be a waste of time. The Government, therefore, will send the Bill up to the Lords before Whitsun, and it will become law under the operation of the Parliament Act a month afterwards.

It might be thought that, having decided upon this, there was no more for the Government to do. That is not Mr. Asquith's view. The Government will, shortly after the Home Rule Bill has gone up to the Lords, introduce an amending Bill in the Commons, in which it will set out the concessions it means to make. The reason offered by Mr. Asquith for this course is that it will give a prolonged term for discussion and for the arrangement of a settlement by consent. The Opposition want to have it on record that they are unalterably opposed to Home Rule in any shape or form. They are to be given the opportunity of putting that on record by voting steadily to the end against the Home Rule Bill. On the other hand, they know that Home Rule in one shape or other must come, but they want it to appear that they are consenting not to Home Rule, but to a device for averting "civil war." Hence an amending Bill. Well, it may be prudent to do rather unusual things in order to save the face of the Opposition, and even Liberals who have no special desire to help Mr. Bonar Law and his colleagues out of their embarrassments, will make no objection to this device. But, these formalities apart, the central question is, what is to be in the Amending Bill, and what chance has this of acceptance by the leaders of the Opposition? One may assume after Mr. Lloyd George's speech on Tuesday that the original draft of the Amending Bill will embody the concessions outlined on the occasion of the second reading, but Mr. Asquith talks of subsequent "concerted discussion, not perhaps on the floor of the House, though ultimately on the floor." That can hardly mean anything else than further concessions. Whether these concessions are acceptable to Liberal Home Rulers will depend upon their character; but it is clear that such a mode of procedure has the grave disadvantage of putting upon the Government once again the onus of further advance and of setting it upon a road which may easily prove dangerous.

Mr. Bonar Law's reply on Tuesday showed what it means. He told Mr. Asquith that he sees no reason whatsoever to share the hope that the Amending Bill will bring peace, and he added that "the only conversations which are of interest or which could serve any useful purpose are conversations between the Prime Minister and Mr. Redmond." In other words, no suggestion, no advance is to be made by the Opposition. If there is to be "peace" it will come only because Home Rulers, who have already made such grave concessions, are to make still further concessions, and that in Mr. Law's vocabulary means the perpetual exclusion of Ulster (even of such parts of Ulster as desire to come under a Home Rule Parliament) and the permanent mutilation and division of Ireland. It is not surprising that Mr. Redmond finds such a prospect disturbing and holds himself and his party free to act as they think fit should anything of the kind happen. We must assume that the Government rejects forthwith Mr. Law's notion of a compromise, in which all the sacrifices come from one party and all the gains are made by the other. In the direction of exclusion Liberalism has already gone to the very limits of concessions, and the most promising line of settlement is elsewhere. If the Irish leaders come together with a sole thought of what is best for Ireland, that line will be found.

CHANCELLOR IN A SCENE

During the debate on Tuesday, when it was rumoured that "Balfour was up", members streamed in through the swing doors to hear a speech, not excited, not in terms very violent, but quietly, remorselessly destructive of peace. "Cheated" was the word applied to the loss of the suggestion stage. What was this Amending Bill? Nobody knew. Drop these "subterranean manoeuvres"—produce the Bill—before Home Rule passes—that the House may vote while retaining its "self respect." What had Mr. Hogge advocated? A shorter veto under the Parliament Act as a "settlement of Ireland". "Rather an infelicitous phrase," remarked Mr. Balfour, meaning "the horrors of civil war and the destruction of life and property".

"You would have had no guns", said Mr. Hogge. And despite Mr. Balfour's answering sarcasms there was force in the remark.

The vital part of the speech was Mr. Balfour's triumphant claim that the prospect of the Amending Bill indicated that Home Rule passed under the Parliament Act was defective—wrong—that the Government had admitted it.

That was the sentence that led to the great scene with Mr. Lloyd George. He took the line that all sides want peace, but that Mr. Balfour's "mischievous criticism"—his taunting claim that every concession was an admission of "defect" in Home Rule and the Parliament Act—made conciliation difficult.

As the reasoning proceeded, Mr. Balfour became extraordinarily restive. He tried at first to put a different construction on his argument. But Mr. Lloyd George was not having that. With a stroke of inspiration, he turned to Sir Edward Carson and declared that he was certain that Sir Edward would not treat the overtures in that spirit.

Sir Edward Carson rose slowly. "All I understood my right hon. friend to say was that the Amending Bill should be produced before the Home Rule Bill receives a second reading"—this was his answer.

"A very clever advocate," replied the Chancellor of the Exchequer. "He covers up the tracks"—(interruption)—"well but let me finish my sentence."

Mr. Balfour was again on his feet, very much perturbed—perturbed by the truth. "If you amend your Bill," said he in effect, "you admit that in relation to particular circumstances it can be improved; I don't want to rub it in."

"No, no." Protested the Liberals, and Mr. Lloyd George insisted that the amendments would be concessions—sacrifices—for the sake of peace. "The right hon. gentleman's argument," he cried, "is the way to promote civil war."

A roar of protest prevented further utterance. What Mr. Balfour kept saying could not be heard amid the din, but his shoulders swung forward again and again as he shouted—for shouting it was—his exclamation.

The speaker rose; spoke mildly to the Opposition; explained that they had misunderstood Mr. Lloyd George; he had not accused Mr. Balfour of promoting civil war, but had only urged that certain arguments were calculated to promote civil war.

"Exactly so, Mr. Speaker," said the Chancellor, adding that, of course, he would never have suggested that Mr. Balfour deliberately tried to give cause for bloodshed. But how did it help peace when every offer was "jeered at"?

Mr. Balfour was again at the table—moved beyond his wont—indeed, speaking with great difficulty. "An unfortunate remark of mine," said he with seeming humility. "I withdraw it—(a murmur of sympathy)—and substitute for it not that the amendments will show defects, but that they will add perfections to the Home Rule Bill."

A hurricane of delighted cheering broke from the Tories, and from this point onwards it was fighting all the way. When Mr. Lloyd George said that Lord Robert Cecil's speech was "unusually offensive", Lord Winterton, amid the chorus of oburgation, got in the remark: "There spoke the expert."

When Mr. Lloyd George denied that the Prime Minister had given a pledge to allow a suggestion stage, a Tory said to his friends: "What matter? He'd break it if he could."

As for secret conclaves, what about meetings at Lansdowne House? "They are angry because these Bills are leaving for the Statute Book," he concluded, and when Lord Robert Cecil asked: "What's your anger about?" the Chancellor not only claimed that he was "cheery and optimistic"—he looked it.

ANOTHER SCENE: THE SPEAKER'S REBUKE TO EARL WINTERTON.

The past week has been full of lively scenes in the House. The speaker's position has been a most unenviable one, though it is admitted on all hands that Mr. Lowther is fully retaining his reputation for the extraordinary manner in which he has, since his election to the chair, preserved peace and order amongst hon. members, particularly at a time when party feelings run very high and when the least provocation creates intense excitement and wild party passion in the ranks of the Opposition. The following incident, which occurred on Wednesday, is typical of the series of scenes that the House has been witnessing of late.

The Marquiss of Tullibardine asked the Prime Minister whether the late Secretary for War was still attending committees at the War Office and was still dealing with Army matters; and whether he was still a member of the Committee of Imperial Defence.

Mr. Asquith.—The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. As regards the latter part, the late Secretary of State for War is still summoned to meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence.

The Marquiss of Tullibardine.—I ask the right hon. gentleman if he considers it a sound principle that an ex-Cabinet Minister who has lost the confidence of the Cabinet (cries of "Order") should still be summoned to meetings of the Imperial Defence Committee and should still serve on committees which concern the department which he has just quitted.

Mr. Asquith.—My right hon. friend has not lost the confidence of the Cabinet. (Cheers.)

The Marquiss of Tullibardine.—If he has not lost the confidence of the Cabinet, why is he not in office?

The Speaker.—That is going a long way from the question on the paper.

There were loud cheers and interruptions and cries of "Order" from both sides at this point and, amid the uproar, Earl Winterton was heard shouting to the Ministerialists below the gangway: "Order yourself." To this a member retorted, "Order yourself a drink."

Before the noise had ceased, the speaker called on Sir O. Kinloch-Cooke to put the next question, when Earl Winterton, rising amid renewed cries from the Ministerialists, was understood to say: "There are to be no more supplementary questions."

The Speaker.—I ask the noble lord not to attempt to keep order. That responsibility, I am sorry to say, is placed upon me, and I must ask the noble lord not to interfere. If I require his services I will invite them. (Cheers.)

Earl Winterton.—May I in justice be allowed to say that I was going to ask what I thought was a proper question and was not aware of any order preventing me from doing so. Several hon. gentlemen opposite shouted loudly "Order" before you had said anything.

The Speaker.—I beg the noble lord's pardon. I had already called on Sir Clement Kinloch-Cooke and he had risen to put his question.

Earl Winterton.—Why I replied to hon. gentlemen opposite was that I was under the impression that you kept order and not they. (Cries of "Order.")

THE TIMES AND A NEW BOGEY: "AMERICANIZATION" OF CANADA.

The Times has created a new bogey. It is Canada this time. Its Toronto correspondent, in a long letter, warns the British public, in the usual solemn style of the Times, of the approaching danger in Canada, if England would not "look out" in time. "They," the letter proceeds, "can have no natural loyalty to Great Britain, no enthusiasm for the British Empire, no inherited conception of British ideals. Even now the French and foreign elements nearly balance the population of British origin. The French are passive loyalists and devoted Canadians, but they are not generally favourable to closer political co-operation with the mother country. During the war in South Africa the attitude of the French Canadians closely resembled that of the Irish Nationalists. . . .

Who doubts that any movement to establish a Canadian Republic would have support in Quebec? . . . So many English-speaking Americans who have come to Canada continue to subscribe for American journals. Moreover, a multitude of Canadians read, perhaps by preference, sporting papers, weekly journals, and magazines from the neighbouring country. All the Canadian daily newspapers give columns of space to reports of games in the American Baseball Leagues, and there is an international league which embraces Toronto and Montreal. . . . The cable news services are designed primarily for American consumption. This has been conclusively demonstrated in all the recent dispatches covering the struggle between British Liberals and British Unionists over Home Rule for Ireland, describing conditions in Ulster, and estimating the state of feeling in Great Britain. . . . A portion of one Press begins to ascribe all social and political evils in Great Britain to 'the landlords' and 'the aristocracy.' Letters from special correspondents come to Canadian journals aflame with contempt, if not with hatred, for lords and dukes. We have writers aping and demagogues mouthing Lloyd-George, and boldly challenging the foundations of many honoured and venerable British institutions. Is there only concern for 'autonomy' behind the desperate resistance to naval co-operation with Great Britain?

Canada and the United States have common traditions and common institutions, a common language and a common faith. . . . Into the Dominion pour multitudes who will quickly develop a Canadian patriotism. What attitude will they take towards Great Britain and the Empire? What will be the ultimate effect of the Lloyd George teaching on 'Democracy' in Canada? At the moment it is not wholesome. It may become dangerously divisive and destructive. One catches a new note now and again. As yet we are all passive Imperialists. But there are elements in Canada to which an appeal against Imperialism can be made and who know no "mother country." Do British statesmen and British journalists fully understand the Canadian aspect of the Imperial problem, and how vitally careless handling would affect the whole structure and future of the Empire?"

The Times, under the heading, "A warning from Canada," writes a leading article on this subject, in the course of which it expresses a hope that "statesmen in the mother country, and indeed all those who are capable of thinking seriously about the future of the Empire, will take its warning to heart." "As time goes on," says the article, "are all things working, as they should, for a British Canada in the future, or for an American . . . In the United States, no doubt, there is still the old belief that Canada must some day, and by her own will, be 'annexed' . . . and one Canadian correspondent warns us gravely that the prevailing tendencies are towards what may be generally called 'Americanization.'" "It is time," concludes the article, "for practical people at home to 'wake up' and to get to business."

Your readers will, no doubt, realise for themselves the comparative resemblance which this latest bogey of the Times bears to its "Indian peril." It is plain that the strong conservative instincts of the writer are responsible for this most recent humbug. It is a great pity that noble lords in England are being ridiculed by the Canadian Press! It is very sad to think that Mr. Lloyd George's policy of social reform in this country is finding an echo in the Dominion! It is heart-rending to know that the Canadian people are rapidly losing all respect and admiration for the great and ancient aristocratic families of the United Kingdom! It is indeed abominable to realise that democracy is gaining ground in that part of the Empire! It is not very comforting to be told that Home Rule for Ireland is most popular in that great self-governing colony of the Crown! Surely these considerations are sufficient to warrant the Times to seriously warn its readers of the approaching danger in Canada! If Canada is going in more for American sports, American films, American journals and American pastimes, what could possibly prevent it from being gradually "absorbed" into the American Republic? The entire line of arguments and the whole discussion of the situation, as produced by the Times, are grotesque to the extreme degree. If anything could possibly succeed in shaking the loyalty of the Canadians, it would be the writings of irresponsible journalists, such as the Canadian correspondent of this journal. In fact, no greater libel on the devotion of the people of Canada to the Crown could be possibly imagined. The Times is ever busy creating "perils" in various parts of the Empire and the only consolation one could derive under the circumstances is the fact that thinking men and women of this country are not happily now-a-days much influenced by the opinions expressed in its columns. The successive bogeys of the Times have been repeatedly exposed in India and elsewhere and it is certain that its latest alarm in connection with the Dominion will prove as false as its numerous predecessors.

INDIAN DELEGATES IN LONDON.

The Indian National Congress delegates, who arrived in London on Sunday last, had a prolonged interview with Lord Crewe on Monday at the India Office. Sir William Waddeburn was also present. They have already visited the House of Commons, where they met the Indian Parliamentary Committee, with whom they discussed the various questions relating to the proposed changes in the India Council.

NEW ANGLO-INDIAN JOURNAL IN LONDON.

A New Anglo-Indian Journal, the Indiaman, a weekly "link" with India, has made its first appearance to-day. In it are incorporated both the "Overland Mail" and the "Homeward Mail" established in 1858.

In a leading article it says:—"We believe that under providence the destinies of Great Britain and India are interwoven, and that the bond cannot be broken without results disastrous to India, shameful to Great Britain, and intolerable to the civilized world. But we hold strongly that the bond is the bond of brotherhood and comradeship, and one great object is to make the Indians and the people of the United Kingdom and Great Britain think the best and make the best of one another. We shall avoid the alarmist note, and shall not talk of the "Indian peril". The only peril lies in ignorance and misunderstanding."

The Indiaman contains "notes of the week," special articles on the designs of New Delhi, general and provincial Indian news, shipping intelligence, etc. It is obviously too early yet to be able to judge as to how far the Indiaman will carry out the spirit of its bond of "brotherhood and comradeship," when dealing with grave Indian matters. Its future career will be followed with no little interest.

TETE TETE

AFTER the deplorable events of last July and August that had occurred at Cawnpore we must be pardoned for exhibiting more than the ordinary amount of interest in the careers of Messrs. Sim and Tyler. The Cawnpore Municipality has recently been in financial straits, and in spite of our sympathy for that body we could not but heave a sigh of relief for the assurance thus indirectly conveyed that Mr. Sim would no longer be able to afford the luxury of pulling down Cawnpore mosques in order to build pavements on "Sanitary" roads. Mr. Tyler had, however, hugged obscurity after having appropriated all the limelight for several months last year, but he has once more appeared before the footlights in the old rôle of the "Protector of Municipal Chairmen".

Mr. Tyler Again.

On the 27th May a point of law of some importance was decided by Mr. Justice Piggott at the Allahabad High Court in the case of one Nathi Mal. Mr. Howard appeared for Nathi Mal and the Assistant Government Advocate represented the Crown. Counsel for Nathi Mal in opening the case remarked that in all his experience he had never come across a case in which the provisions of a section had been so distorted to meet the wishes of a Magistrate. The facts were that proceedings against Nathi Mal were before Mr. Williamson, Joint Magistrate of Cawnpore, for an offence under Section 411 of the Indian Penal Code. During the progress of the trial an application to the High Court had been made by Nathi Mal asking for the transfer of his case to some other Magistrate as the applicant did not expect a fair and impartial trial in the court of Mr. Williamson. The High Court rejected the application. Subsequently, on Nathi Mal being called on by the Joint Magistrate for a list of his witnesses, a list was filed, but certain of the witnesses by an order of the Magistrate were not summoned. Against this order of refusal to summon the witnesses an application was made to the High Court which was admitted but not earnestly contested, for by the date it came on for hearing Mr. Williamson had been transferred from Joint Magistrate to Chairman of the Municipal Board, Cawnpore. The case then came before Mr. Johnson who had succeeded Mr. Williamson as Joint Magistrate. Mr. Tyler, the District Magistrate of Cawnpore, who could not be supposed to be ignorant of the loss of prestige involved in the transfer of a case from a member of the Premier Service, whether by order or by accident, at this stage purported to act under Section 528 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and passed an order transferring the case for trial to—Mr. Williamson!

THIS was the order which came before Mr. Justice Piggott for disposal.

It was submitted by counsel that the Chairman of the Municipality not exercising any magisterial powers was not a Magistrate within the meaning of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and, secondly, that a Chairman of the Municipality was certainly not "subordinate" to the District Magistrate. The Assistant Government Advocate, evidently possessing a child-like confidence in the superiority of a Collector above all else on God's earth, contended that Mr. Williamson, having been invested under Section 12 of the Code of Criminal Procedure with first class powers, was not divested of the said powers by the transfer, to the post of Chairman. His lordship in disposing of the application remarked: "The District Magistrate in Cawnpore has, for certain reasons given, transferred the criminal case pending in the court of 'Mr. Johnson, Joint Magistrate of Cawnpore, for trial to Mr. Williamson, Chairman of the Municipal Board of Cawnpore. I "have no doubt that when Mr. Williamson was gazetted to the office of the Chairman of the Cawnpore Municipal Board and took charge of that office, he was thereby divested of his territorial jurisdiction as Magistrate of the first class attached to the Cawnpore district. Even if it be conceded for purposes of argument that Mr. Williamson continued to be a Magistrate while holding the office of the Chairman of the Municipal Board, I am quite clear that he is not a Magistrate subordinate to the District Magistrate of Cawnpore. The order complained of is not sustainable. It is hereby set aside." So Mr. Tyler thinks that the Chairman of the Cawnpore Municipality is not only the Chairman of the Cawnpore Municipality but also a first class Magistrate. Once a Magistrate always a Magistrate, and we daresay Mr. Tyler would have serious objection to giving up the powers of a District Magistrate, including the authority to order the shooting down of little children and old men, if he was gazetted an Opium Agent or Excise Commissioner. O, sanctas simplicitas! We wonder whether a transfer across the Styx would matter at all either, and whether the Assistant Government Advocate would not like to have trials by the graveside of Civilians gazetted during their lifetime as Magistrates. Mr. Howard who seemed to have been so shocked at the distortion of a section of the Criminal Procedure Code to suit the wishes of Mr. Tyler evidently knows neither Mr. Tyler nor the elasticity of the various sections of the various Codes in Cawnpore. That, however, is another story. What concerns us here is the fact that a judge of the High Court of Allahabad has tried to teach Mr. Tyler that there is a High Court even in the United Provinces and that it can overrule the wild vagaries of some District Magistrates that pass by the name of judgments and judicial orders. May he prove an apt pupil, or take an early pension.

NAWAB MOHAMED ISHAQ KHAN SAHEB, the Honorary Secretary of the Moslem University Association, writes to us an appreciative letter about our remarks in a recent issue about the Association and the forthcoming elections for its membership and we cordially acknowledge it with thanks.

The Moslem University Association.

He, however, wishes to point out that his appeal for enrolment in the different constituencies have not been limited to the Aligarh Institute Gazette only, as we had seemed to suggest. While hoping that his appeals published in the Gazette would be reproduced by other journals suo motu, the Nawab Sahab tells us that he also thought it advisable to take the precaution of sending extracts from the Gazette to more than a hundred Moslem papers with a request to reproduce them, and we find that most of these papers complied with his request. Recently a note was circulated by the Nawab Sahab reminding these papers about the final date for the enrolment of names and inviting people belonging to the various classes of the community to have themselves enrolled by that date. Nay, more. The Nawab Sahab sent numerous letters individually to Graduates, Zamindars and Tax-payers personally known to him and to others interested in the movement. But what was the result? By the end of May, 10 Zamindars, 5 Tax-payers and 6 Graduates had enrolled themselves! It is true that the Press has 15 names to its credit, but it must be remembered that there is no enrolment or annual fee for the Press as there is in the case of the other three constituencies. If all those who have had their names enrolled voted for themselves, the 10 Zamindars would just fill the seats allotted to them, but the Tax-payers would still have half the seats vacant. As for the Graduates, their absorbing interest in the Moslem University is evidenced by the fact that even after the election of every constituent on the register, there will be nearly three times as many seats left unoccupied! If this is not disgraceful we do not know what to call it. Are there no more than 6 Moslem Graduates in all India who have any desire to manage the affairs of a Trust created for the establishment of the Moslem University which has an income of over a lakh of rupees? Is Rs. 15 such a prohibitive figure that no more than 6 Moslem Graduates in all India can afford to pay it as the price of a great privilege? At any rate, if nobody else comes forward to claim privileges that are going abegging, we would urge the Old Boys of the College who own even a bigha of land or pay even rupees as income-tax or who have graduated at least five years ago to send in Rs. 15 each for enrolment as member of as many of the three constituencies as they can. And there is no reason why such Old Boys as have already been elected by the Trustees or the Conference or their own Association should not enroll themselves and secure the right of electing others. Some Old Boys are already enlisting themselves and we hope no less than a hundred Old Boys would enlist as Zamindars and Tax-payers and that two or three hundred would enlist as Graduates. As regards the final date for enrolment, the Nawab Sahab would have been fully justified in refusing to extend the period once more, specially as even after our appeal in the Comrade of the 23rd May no marked improvement is noticeable. But the Nawab Sahab is prepared to extend the period by a month and the final date for enrolment will now be the 15th of July. It is impossible to extend the time beyond this date for the Ramzan will then be upon us and as the College would be closed for the long vacation earlier than usual the staff of the Honorary Secretary will not be available for work in connection with the elections. There is thus still more than a month before us all and we trust it will not be wasted like the last eleven months.

Will the Honorary Secretary kindly furnish us with the names of persons enrolled on each register up to date and send us the weekly additions also every Wednesday so that we could publish them in our weekly issues for general information? As regards the representation of the Press, we submit that journals and not individual editors should be elected. Editors are professional men and may cease to be editors or even journalists at any time after their election. We hope this suggestion will be accepted.

MR. SHAUKAT ALI, Hon. Secretary of the Aligarh Old Boys' Association writes to us:—"I would be extremely obliged if you would kindly allow me to appeal to the Old Boys to take up Aligarh and other communal work seriously in hand. The Moslem University Association must be brought into existence as early as possible. The Trustees, the Mohomedan Educational Conference and the Old Boys have already elected their representatives. The Moslem graduates, the zamindars, the tax-payers and the Press have to fill in the vacancies allotted to them respectively. I am informed that owing to various causes, which have been distracting the attention of our people, very few names have been registered in the graduates' and the zamindars' guilds. According to the rules such Aligarh Old Boys as are graduates of 'five years' standing and send in Rs. 15 at once to the Honorary Secretary of the Moslem University Association, would be eligible for election and have a vote. So far only 6 names have been registered for 20 vacancies. The zamindars also can get enrolled by the payment of Rs. 15 only. Ten names have been registered for 10 vacancies. We have no desire to pack the Moslem University Association with the Aligarh Boys, in fact we would be glad to give others a chance; but if they are not forthcoming, the Old Aligarh graduates and Old Boy zamindars should gladly come forward. We are not ashamed of the part the old Aligarhians have taken in communal affairs and I think the general Moslem public has often gratefully acknowledged our services. Our college and its students have won a warm corner for themselves in the hearts of the Mussalmans and never did our community love Aligarh more than it does at the present time. Now, we must devote our time to work for the development of our University. I appeal to all the Old Boys to take this work up in right earnest. They have to build up Aligarh and they must do it. They should help us also (1) in increasing the membership of the Old Boys' Association. (The College needs greater financial aid and we ought to contribute our share to it), (2) in clearing up arrears due from them, and (3) in the building of the upper storey of the 'Old Boys' Lodge, so that in future, we may be free to place all our income at the disposal of the College. We Old Boys must wake up now."

The London correspondent of the Times of India, writing about the annual meeting of the Sailors' Home, "Chilling Silence". at which Lord Ampthill was re-elected chairman for another year, says that the Rev. J. P. Haythornwaite, late Principal of St. John's College, Agra, dwelt on the besetting sin of Englishmen, "which he described as racial arrogance". The correspondent accuses the Rev. Haythornwaite of "questionable taste" on this account. He declares that the annual meeting of an institution "maintained by the gifts of English people for the succour and comfort of a humble class of Asiatics was scarcely appropriate for a discussion of the vexed question of the admission of Indians to European clubs". He is consoled to think, however, that "the speech was received in chilling silence." Evidently the correspondent is of opinion that the Asiatic Sailors' Home is not a fit place in which to talk about the improvement of social intercourse between Indians and Englishmen. He would rather expect the speakers to lecture the "humble class of Asiatics" on the duty of gratitude and on the bountifulness of European charity. If the Rev. Haythornwaite had talked the usual, comforting platitudes about the White Man's burden and praised the sweet urbanity of temper and large humility of Englishmen in India, the correspondent would have thought differently of his sense and taste. But he chose to say exactly what he felt to be the truth. His critic, however, seems to have no stomach for such unsavoury things. Subjects going to the roots of the problems which may have a decisive bearing on the relations between India and England are evidently becoming, like religion, mere matters of taste—at least among a class of Englishmen of which the London correspondent of the Times of India is the type. Racial arrogance expresses itself in various forms. But it finds its most characteristic expression in "chilling silence".

We regret the Bengal Government has so far done little to allay the growing excitement among the Mussalmans of Calcutta in regard to the fate of several mosques and burial places involved in the Kidderpore Docks Extension Scheme.

Mosques and Burial Places.

The Mosque Defence Committee in Calcutta had decided sometime ago to send a deputation to H. E. the Governor with a view to lay before him the facts of the case. It appears, however, that Lord Carmichael has declined to receive the deputation saying that he is fully aware of the facts and of the requirements of the Moslem law on the subject and that the proposed deputation would serve no useful purpose. If Lord Carmichael is aware of the Islamic law in relation to mosques and burial places, we are at a loss to understand why he is keeping the Mussalmans in acute suspense. The Islamic law in this respect is most emphatic and well-defined and can admit of no ambiguity. It lays down that no mosque or burial ground shall be demolished or turned to other uses. We are really surprised that this simple and direct injunction is not clearly grasped by some English officials in India and, even after certain recent sad experiences, it has yet to be fully realised that any violation of the law amounts to a grave sacrilege in the eyes of Mussalmans and deeply wounds their religious feelings. We have yet strong hopes that a sympathetic and level-headed Governor like Lord Carmichael will allow the Mussalmans to represent their case to him and he would take action accordingly. He cannot be unaware of the manifestations of the growing excitement in Calcutta and other places, and we have every reason to think that he will do all he can to remove the genuine and deep-seated grievance of the Calcutta Mussalmans. Our warnings were not heeded at Cawnpore. May they be heeded at Calcutta and a second tragedy of errors avoided.

We reproduce elsewhere an article "On toleration and the Turk" from the Nation purporting to be a review of Mr. Sydney Whitman's book, "Turkish Memories", recently published in London.

"On Toleration and the Turk."

The Nation disposes of the whole of the book as the work of a partial historian, but selects one conclusion of the author as a thesis on which it elaborates a long-drawn argument. This conclusion is stated to be that "the persecutions and massacres of the Armenians were in no sense religious, that fanaticism played no part in them, and that they were a purely political reprisal for the outrages and seditious propaganda of Armenian revolutionaries." The Nation accepts the accuracy of this observation "so far as it goes." It says that "Islam has never earned Gibbon's censure on the early Church; it has never defended absurdities by cruelties." It admits that the Bulgarian "atrocities" and the Armenian "massacres" would have never taken place had there been no Bulgarian insurrections and Armenian secret revolutionary societies. Still, however, it is prepared to believe that "Armenians and Bulgarians were exposed to the intermittent sufferings and humiliations which provoked insurrection only because they were Christians, and at any time they might have escaped all danger by becoming Moslems." Even if this were true, it only serves to emphasize the secular nature of the task confronting Turkish statesmen who have had to administer a vast Empire comprising diverse races, some of which never concealed their "nationalist aspirations." Even if an empire is based on conquest it has to be maintained intact—at least from the point of view of the conqueror. We are not concerned with the ethics of nationalist aspirations, but we know full well that no statesmen of Germany, France and England—to take the most advanced countries of modern Europe—would for a moment tolerate separatist and exclusive "aspirations" within their respective empires. If the Turk crushed spasmodic revolts within his dominions "to secure the outworks of his empire", he only practiced the most approved doctrine of modern Imperialist statecraft. As regards toleration, the Nation thinks that it has long since ceased to be the ideal of civilised men. It is an attitude of contempt in the strict sense of the word. "It represented in European history a half-way house, and a middle term between persecution and full civil equality." That may be true. It only means, then, that religious conscience has become a mere irrelevance in the organisation of modern States. It will not be very wrong to say that the idea of "full civil equality" has sprung from the "toleration" of unbelief. But the important question is whether full civil liberty exists in any empire of modern Europe. As an ideal it is as beautiful and inspiring as any Utopian conception, but has it been actually achieved in practice in any part of the world? The truth is that Europe has travelled from the generous toleration of positive belief to a peculiarly secular intolerance propped up by unbelief and based on pseudo-scientific theories and half-truths about distinctive cultures, racial types and social characteristics. Whether this implies an advance on the earlier ideal many may find sufficient reasons to doubt. And would the Nation tell us where we are? At the half-way house still?

II.—THE CASE OF THE "BADR."

LAST week we dealt with the case of the Ahl-i-Hadees which has had to deposit under the Press Act two securities amounting in the aggregate to Rs. 3,000 for replying in a fair and far more courteous manner to the foul vituperation of Rev. Thomas Howell, a Pastor of the Church of England, against Islam, its Prophet and his followers. To-day we discuss the still more deplorable case of the Badr. This paper was required to furnish the security of Rs. 3,000 for venturing to publish under the heading: "The Birth of the Messiah," a rejoinder to the same Church dignitary, as well as to some Moslem publications containing the view that Jesus Christ was the son of Joseph the Carpenter. The Badr failed to furnish such a security and in consequence had to cease publication after a career of eleven years.

As we have shown in the previous article, the Christian doctrine of Atonement is based on the Christian belief that all descendants of Adam inherit the "original sin," but that Jesus Christ was sinless because he was not the son of man, but only born of woman. The Badr in its issue of 30th October, 1913, controverted this belief on grounds similar to those of the Ahl-i-Hadees. In the first place, said the Badr, nobody can be considered sinful or sinless on account of his birth but only on account of his own actions. Had it been otherwise, Adam should have been the most sinless person. In the second place, the "original sin" was not Adam's but that of Eve, and if the Christian theory be accepted, the seed of sin is chiefly in woman, and he who is born of woman alone would have more inclination to sin. The writer then cites the text from the Book of Job from which the writer in the Ahl-i-Hadees had also sought assistance. In the third place, says he, "it is not a sign of perfection but of the weakness and frailty of human condition to be born of woman alone. It is possible that if His Holiness (Hazrat) 'the Messiah (On whom be Blessings and Peace) did not marry throughout his life, it may have been due to some such cause." He concludes that "at any rate, to have been without a father was no 'ground of any kind of superiority for the Messiah (himself), but 'this fact was an indication that there had not remained among the 'Jews a single man so worthy that the bringer of the good tidings of 'the Last of the Prophets could be called his son." And the writer tacks on to this view the indirect praise of the late Mirza Ghulam Ahmad Sahib of Qadian, the founder of the sect of which the Badr was an organ, and believed by his followers to be the "Second Messiah," that "in the same manner the Second Messiah did not deign to be 'called the spiritual son of anyone by becoming the disciple of some 'hereditary preceptor."

That is all that the Badr itself wrote on the subject of Jesus Christ, and we defy the Secretary of State to point out a syllable in all this that can even remotely suggest the description of "wantonly scurrilous and offensive" which he has felt compelled to apply to it. But we shall probably be told that the issue of the Badr which drew upon that journal the wrath of the Punjab Government contained something more than the editorial views which we have reproduced with the utmost fidelity. Yes, it did contain something more than these editorial views, for, as we have stated at the very outset, this journal had not only to reply to Rev. Thomas Howell on the doctrine of Atonement but also to some Mohamedan writers on the subject of the birth of Christ, notably to a Maulvi Mohamed Sa'eed author of a book called the "Sa'adat-i-Maryamiyyah", who had sought to prove that Jesus Christ was the son of Joseph the Carpenter in the ordinary course of nature. The writer in the Badr says: "The 'second aspect of the birth of the Messiah is that to which the 'Naturalists' (Sir Syed Ahmad Khan and his school of Moslem rationalists 'are called by that name) object that such a thing is opposed to the 'Laws of Nature. Haji Hafiz Mohamed Ahsan had caused to be 'published in the periodical called An-Najm a rejoinder to this based 'on science and we reproduce the following extracts from it for the 'benefit of the public."

Let us examine the Badr's reprint from the Najm, which we may however, explain had already been published elsewhere before it appeared even in the Najm of Lucknow in 1912. The writer condemns, on the one hand, the attitude of those who consider it "infidelity" to ask why and wherefore even about such religious beliefs and about such stories in their religious books as reason cannot accept and who yet never fail to sneer at and abuse the beliefs of others; and, on the other hand, deploras a soi disant civilization which is every day diminishing respect for religion, and increasing the pride of people in their limited individual reason. However, he arrives at the eminently sane conclusion that the time is past when people could accept a doctrine which was capable of discussion and proof without subjecting it to a searching inquiry or when they could find an easy deliverance by calling the critic an Infidel. He then proceeds to declare that Islam is capable of explaining every doctrine and belief in a rational manner, though it is enough to satisfy a Mussalman that to the God in Whom he believes everything is possible. He takes up the Moslem belief in the Immaculate Conception which, he says, is the subject of much criticism, although Christians share it with Mussalmans except for the belief in the Godhead of Christ and in the Trinity. He points out that the Jews did not believe in the purity of Mary, and that it was owing to such doubts that Christ's mission was practically a failure during his lifetime, but that, owing to the fact that belief in miracles and in the suspension of the Laws of Nature was common in those days, the world finally came to acquiesce in the Immaculate Conception as a miracle. Nevertheless, this belief, says the writer, was buttressed by a number of conditions and doctrines so mysterious and puzzling that it became a veritable labyrinth from which there was no apparent exit, and consequently among the scientists of to-day there is a very large body of men "who agree with the Jews in their disbelief in the 'greatness and glory of the holy leader of the Christian faith (Jesus 'Christ)'. He then tells us that even some Mussalmans have been cast in doubt by the dictum of the Quran that "You shall not find any change in the arrangements of Allah", and in order to escape this objection have accepted "that the Lady (Hazrat) Mary was married to 'Joseph the Carpenter and the Lord (Janab) Messiah was in reality 'the son of Joseph'. He is not satisfied with this makeshift and says: "In my capacity as a Mussalman I pen the 'ideas that have occurred to me about the birth of the 'Messiah (Peace be upon him) in order to refute the objections of 'scientists, and I trust that my explanations will be right, and that 'not only will my co-religionist Moslem brethren look upon this 'with appreciative eyes, but that the church-frequenting Christian 'monks and divines will hail this with cordial enthusiasm." Little could he guess, indeed, that instead of being hailed with cordial enthusiasm by cloistered monks and church-frequenting divines, it would rouse the wrath of the Punjab Government several years after its first publication, that on its being published a third time it would cost the publisher a deposit of Rs. 3,000, and, on his failure to furnish it, the complete cessation of his journal, and that a Minister of His Majesty the King-Emperor in far-off London would tell a venturesome questioner that the Secretary of State could only describe this defence of the Immaculate Conception as "wantonly scurrilous and offensive." It was certainly not confined to the days of Burn that "the schemes of mice and men gang aft agley."

We have a great mind to translate the whole of the thesis and brave the wrath of Government, but the space at our disposal will not permit us to do so. We shall therefore explain here the nature of the arguments advanced and the hypothesis set up by the writer. He tells us, what is only too true, that reproduction in animals is of two kinds. For as biologists know, reproduction is either asexual or sexual. In asexual reproduction, such as in the case of some common worms, no sexual congress takes place, and if the whole body is cut into pieces, each portion may grow into a new organism. Sexual reproduction is the production of a new organism from a cell (called zygote) resulting from the conjugation of two gametes or sexual cells derived from the specialized reproductive tissue of the parent or parents. In asexual reproduction by spore formation, the spore proliferates without the aid of another spore; in true sexual reproduction the gametes may be regarded as special kinds of spores which appear in two forms, the egg-cell, ovum or female gamete not proceeding to proliferate into a new organism until it has been stimulated by partial or complete fusion with the other form, the spermatozoon or male gamete. From a perusal of his thesis it does not appear that the writer is well versed and quite up-to-date in his biology, but it suffices to know that he bases his arguments on what knowledge he possesses of biology. While accepting the view that for reproduction of the human species, unlike the asexual reproduction of the Kechua and the Birbahoti, and the wasp (as he believes), the sexual congress of the male and the female is necessary, he instances the unproductive brown eggs of the domestic fowl to prove that in certain animals the reproductive material or germ-plasm shows the capacity of combining the functions and indications of both male and female gametes, even though it may be imperfect. He then quotes from a work of Hakim Arkani (Mufarrah-il-Quloob) that the reproductive material of some females combines the properties of both kinds of reproductive tissues, but respectfully rejects this opinion as open to the objection that it may have been designed to be a provision for the explanation of the Immaculate Conception. He regards this as all the more unacceptable because it is opposed to the teaching of modern science. This is perhaps the theory of Parthenogenesis or the production of the new organism from the female gamete without previous conjugation with the male gamete which Aristotle recognised as occurring in the bee which produced drones. According to the accepted biological view, parthenogenesis remains doubtful even in the case of the bee and other insects in which parthenogenetic development results in the production of males. At any rate, the writer argues at some length against the reproductive tissues of the female containing both the male and female sexual cells capable of fertility by conjugation.

Having rejected this theory, he deals with what zoologists call Animal Teratology, a department of morphological science treating of deviations from the normal development of the embryo, and gives instances of monstrosities from the common dwarf to the double monsters to be seen in the glass-cases of museums. Hermaphroditism, too, is a form of monstrosity with which only biologists may now have to deal; but it was at one time believed to be possible in the human species and, among others, Moslem doctors of law have exercised much ingenuity in dealing with such possibilities. Now the primary distinction of sex resides in the essential organs of reproduction. An organism that contains the germinal tissue producing sexual cells known as spermatozoa is a male; an organism containing the tissue which produces ova is known as female. One producing both ova and spermatozoa is a hermaphrodite. Associated with the presence of the primary reproductive organs there may be a large number of other characters, and attempts have been made to classify them as secondary and tertiary sexual characters. In the primary sexual characters all that is essential is the power of producing ova or spermatozoa, and the possession of all else, such as sexual ducts and reservoirs, intromittent and copulatory organs, and organs associated with oviposition, gestation, parturition and nutrition of the immature young in any stage, is only auxiliary. Differences between the sexes in size, shape, appearance, ornamentation, armament, colour and coloration, voice, and instincts and habits not directly associated with the reproductive processes are among the secondary sexual characters. Hermaphroditism is the condition in which gonads producing ova and gonads producing spermatozoa are contained in the same individual. The term hermaphroditism, however, has been applied frequently to cases of a different kind, in which there is no evidence of essential sexual organs being affected, the appearances relating wholly to the auxiliary primary or the secondary sexual characters. It is most probable that such conditions differ entirely from true hermaphroditism. With regard to the auxiliary primary organs, and especially the genital ducts and external organs of sex, in a majority of cases, as in vertebrates in which hermaphroditism is rare, the embryonic or youthful condition is undifferentiated, and so to say, contains the initial material which may be elaborated by specialization in one direction or the other, by the proliferation of certain portions and the suppression of others, into the structures characteristic of the male or the female. Sometimes growth takes place without normal differentiation, sometimes the specialization in one direction lags, with the result that a dubious appearance arises. Subsequent dissection, or the approach of maturity, however, makes it plain that the dubious was superficial and that the gonad of only one sex was present. Among mammals, including man, every normal male retains relics of the female side of the undifferentiated condition of the accessory sexual organs, whilst every normal female contains similar if less well-marked relics of the male condition. Apparent hermaphroditism depending on a dubious condition of the secondary sexual characters is equally widespread in possible occurrence. Among insects which have been much studied, such as the butterflies and moths, many curious conditions have been described; sometimes the pattern and colour of the upper and under sides, sometimes of different parts of the same wing, sometimes of different wings, present the characters of different sexes. Among birds and mammals, the secondary sexual characters of one sex, such as size, pattern or colour, weapons or habits, may appear in animals with the gonads of the other sex, in every degree of development, reaching to an apparently complete reversal. In many cases, these abnormal occurrences are associated with arrest of the functional activity of the primary organs of sex, by disease, accident, or decay, and the failure of the necessary stimulus would certainly serve to explain cases where the apparent reversal is no more than the suppression of a specialization in one direction.

The writer in the Najm whose article the Badr has reproduced discusses both apparent and true hermaphrodites in the human species and cites a reference in a commentary on Siraji by this late Maulana Abdul Halim of Farangi Mahal to a well known person who retained the functional activity of both sexes, and also refers to books of Mohamedan law in which in the chapter devoted to "Khunsa-i-mushakkka," the existence of such persons is discussed in detail. We shall not enter here into the details of the writer's biological arguments, and it is enough for our purpose to state that he believes in the possibility of true hermaphroditism in which the essential reproductive organs of both sexes, that is, gonads producing both ova and spermatozoa, may be found in one and the same individual, with the auxiliary primary organ of only one sex, that is either only the sexual duct and reservoir, or the intromittent and copulatory organ may be found. After this, the writer refers to the familiar natural way in which the reproductive tissues sometimes discharge the germ-plasm without sexual congress. He then states his theory that Mary was a true hermaphrodite, having the essential primary sexual character of both the sexes, while possessing the auxiliary primary sexual character of only the female sex, and builds up a hypothesis about the birth of Jesus Christ with the assistance of certain fairly natural conjectures about Mary's state of feelings which would account for the secretion of germ-plasm from both the male and the female reproductive tissues and the conjugation of the two gametes resulting in a zygote or fertilised egg-cell. We would like to repeat that the writer very clearly states that while Mary possessed both the male and female reproductive tissues, and was thus a true hermaphrodite, she was to all outward appearances like any other woman, there being nothing of the dubious which characterises the pseudo-hermaphrodite to which we have referred in such great detail. He seeks, and to our mind obtains, considerable textual support in the Chapter of the Quran entitled "The Family of Imran", in which the dedication of the child in the womb to the service of God by its mother, the birth of a girl instead of the expected boy, and yet the fulfilment of her vow by Mary's mother are described, and in the midst of the prayer of Mary's mother just after her declaration that she had brought forth only a girl are introduced in parenthesis the significant words: "And God knows best what she had brought forth".

We are not here concerned with the scientific value of the writer's hypothesis, but we have no hesitation in saying, that so far as decency and decorum are concerned there is nothing in the whole thesis in which any but the most prurient person could discover anything vile or vulgar. Even when giving expression to his conjectures about the state of Mary's feeling which led to the Immaculate Conception, he has been careful enough to say that their existence is by no means hostile to purity. "Continence and chastity," says the writer, "do not mean the absence of natural demands on the human heart but to achieve control over such desires is chastity" and continence, and this alone is the definition of a chaste and continent person; for if, as in the case of angels, there was no trace of human desires and passions in the body (of chaste and continent persons), there would have been no ground for distinction "from mankind in general."

This, in the opinion of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, is "calculated to bring into contempt the Christian population of the Province", and it is this which the Secretary of State "can only describe as wantonly scurrilous and offensive." We do not know whether Sir Michael O'Dwyer and the Marquess of Crewe have heard the name of a person who lived in Western Europe in the 12th century and was known as St. Bernard. If so, they perhaps also know that he had explicitly raised the question of the Immaculate Conception. A feast of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin had already begun to be celebrated in some Churches of the West. St. Bernard blames the canons of the metropolitan church of Lyons for instituting such a festival without the permission of the Holy See. In doing so, he takes occasion to repudiate altogether the view that the Conception of Mary was sinless. He writes: "How can there be absence of sin where there is concupiscence (libido)?" and—stronger expressions follow! We know that in St. Bernard's time Christendom possessed a varied and extremely effective machinery for the suppression of unwelcome opinions and the chastisement of those that held them. But even the Holy See had not invented a Press Act such as ours wherewith to gag and to punish, and the spirit of Pope Pius IX., the author of the Bull Ineffabilis Deus, must be fretting and fuming because the great Pope had not enacted a law like ours, with the addition of a clause giving retrospective effect to its provisions, so that there could have been left no record of the views of St. Bernard after 1854 when he promulgated the famous Bull making a belief in the Immaculate Conception, part of the Catholic faith. But so long as these views of St. Bernard are on record, it ill beseems any one calling himself a Christian to object to the words of a Mussalman believing in the Immaculate Conception, and taking such great pains to establish it on a biological basis, on the absurd ground that to regard Mary as a human being, with human desires and passions but chaste withal and continent, would bring into contempt the Christian population of the Punjab.

Last week we had stated that the Secretary of State's claim that he had read the articles concerned was an unmitigated misstatement, for we regarded him to be as incapable of reading the articles as Sir Michael O'Dwyer of writing them. We had, however, guessed that he must have read the words of a Secretariat hireling entrusted with the task of translating extracts from Urdu newspapers. In the case of the Ab-i-Hader this was only a conjecture, but in the case of the Badr we speak with the assurance of certainty. It seems that shocked at the treatment meted out to his paper, the publisher of the Badr applied to the authorities for a copy of the translation on which his fate had been decided, suspecting that this bolt from the blue must have been flung at the instance of the Secretariat hireling who translated the article. Government must now be ruing its unusual candour in furnishing to the publisher of the Badr a copy of what it calls the "Abstract Translation" of the peccant articles. Well, we have a copy of this "Abstract Translation" before us, and we possess few documents of as great a value as that copy for the purpose of showing how Government decisions of great consequence to the people are sometimes arrived at. What fearful wildfowl an "Abstract Translation" can be will be understood when we state that, whereas the article in the Badr occupies more than fifteen columns, the "Abstract Translation" occupies no more than a page and a half of foolscap size in manuscript. The sting of the scorpion lies in its tail, and the rascality of the author of the "Abstract Translation" lies in the last five lines of his handiwork. If Lord Crewe will permit us the temporary use of his words, we shall describe this portion of the "Abstract Translation," as wantonly scurrilous and offensive. We have debated within ourselves for long whether we should reproduce it in these columns, but have been driven to the conclusion that it would be impossible to do so without defiling our columns and disgusting our readers. Evidently the distinction between a true hermaphrodite, without any dubiety in the outward appearance of a female, and a monstrosity with the auxiliary primary characters of both the sexes fully developed, was too fine a discrimination for one of so coarse a texture as the author of the "Abstract Translation," and our readers can well imagine how disgusting and offensive such a person can make the description of the process of the fusion of male and female gametes into a zygote in spite of the writer's clear assertion that it was without sexual congress. If it is not sheer incompetence,—and we think it is not—then it is the result of a deliberate plan to involve the organ of a religious sect of the Mussalmans in trouble, and consequently the scoundrel deserves exemplary punishment. We challenge the Punjab Government and the Secretary of State to place both the articles and the "Abstract Translation" before any of the three Mussalman Councillors, who know Urdu as well as English—the Hon. Sir Ali Imam, the Hon. Nawab Shamsul Huda or Mirza Abbas Ali Baig Saheb, and to ask him whether the latter is not the most monstrous travesty of the former. Sir Michael O'Dwyer has not far to go if he consults the Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi, and we hope the use of such prominent individuals will not be confined to their being the auxiliaries of Mr. Tollinton in administering warnings to peccant journalists. If Government fail to do this they would publish to the world at large their want of courage in retracing a rash step or rectifying an error of judgment. But even if they did, would it not be manifest to everybody that it is impossible to entrust such extensive powers as the Press Act confers even to the much praised local governments without at least giving to an independent judicial tribunal an effective control and extensive powers of revision. It is as clear to us as the noon-day sun that the Punjab Government and the Secretary of State have both been made the dupes of some petty clerk in the Punjab Secretariat; but it is a strange commentary on the British methods of governance that even after a question in the House of Commons on the subject, the authorities have either not been able to discover their mistake or have not the courage to acknowledge it. If neither of these alternatives are correct, then we must believe that so long as a writer uses the phrase Immaculate Conception and characterizes it a Miracle, the Christian population of the Punjab is safe, and the writer is as worthy as Pope Pius IX.—and worthier, let it be said, than St. Bernard!—but the moment he begins to talk in terms of biology and calls the same thing parthenogenesis or hermaphroditism, Hey Presto! Lo and behold! the Christian population of the Punjab is forthwith brought into contempt and the writer becomes a wantonly scurrilous offender! At this rate, before long the mention of an isosceles triangle or a trigonometrical logarithm would bring maidenly blushes to the cheeks of seasoned Simla ladies, and the Press Act would be used effectively against all those who are guilty of wanton scurrility and offensiveness in publishing meteorological reports during the forthcoming monsoon.

The Moslem League and Discipline.

ONLY a few years ago, complaints were not uncommonly heard that the All-India Moslem League was a sort of close corporation which had little direct touch with the currents of popular opinion in the Moslem community. A few even went so far as to describe it as a reactionary body dominated by men of fluid faiths and nimble views, who periodically met to register the decrees of Indian Government and otherwise made use of the organisation as a counterblast to the Indian National Congress. Certain recent events, however, have proved definitely that these complaints were, in the main, groundless. The All-India Moslem League had come to birth at a time when political consciousness among Mussalmans was limited to a small number of individuals who were men of unusual capacity and foresight and had adequate knowledge of public affairs. They had realised the significance of the changes that were slowly but visibly coming over the methods of Indian governance and felt the supreme need of organised political action. They took the initiative and in collaboration with men of weight and influence in the community laid down the framework of an all-India organisation for the purpose. This was the most practicable course open to them under the circumstances. To seek for a democratic basis for the organisation at the time would have been obviously futile. Moslem democracy in the political sense was not yet vocal or alive. The needs of the situation could best be met by the creation of an organisation, representative of the best elements in the community, which would serve the dual functions of educating the general body of the people as well as of safeguarding their interests. The All-India Moslem League was consequently established with these objects in view. Its constitution was designed on as wide a basis as the circumstances could allow, and the scope of its work was naturally confined within the limits of the actual needs of the situation. Soon after the establishment of the League with its provincial and district branches, constitutional and administrative readjustments of far-reaching importance began to take shape in India, which, among other things, helped to rouse the political consciousness of the general Moslem community. The Moslem League proved to be an organised political force of immense value in those anxious times, and its utility both as an organ of representative Moslem opinion and as an instrument of popular education stood the test wonderfully. Within the first few years of its existence it succeeded in defining the Moslem political position, set forth a definite programme of work before the community and offered a common platform to the educated Mussalmans who were vegetating in narrow individual grooves and were pining for larger fields to employ their leisure and talents in the service of their community and country. The political instincts of the Moslem democracy, which had been lying dormant for years, became alive with amazing rapidity and vigour. They found expression in vague but eager desires, some of which outstripped the cautious aspirations embodied in the early creed of the League. The impatient idealism of the new political awakening yearned for lustier cries than the League had yet been able to provide. The League was, therefore, roundly denounced as a lethargic body that moved with exasperating slowness within a limited orbit of its own and lived in severe isolation from the mass of the community that was pulsating with new thoughts and desires.

In the meantime, there began to happen a series of events of unparalleled magnitude, both in India and abroad, which have left an ineffaceable mark on Moslem thought and feeling. The experiences and trials of the community within the last three years have been the bitterest and most searching in its modern history. They shook its deepest and most cherished instincts to their very foundations. The shock of surprise, of betrayal, of disillusionment was felt by every class of Mussalmans with equal intensity. In the sacred intimacy of common grief they discovered anew their Islamic unity and the path that lies before them—a path that is beset with difficulties and perils of various kinds. It is a matter of remarkable significance that the All-India Moslem League has successfully borne the strain of a period of the utmost excitement and self-questioning through which Mussalmans have passed. The movement that it embodied was sound and vital at the core, and it is more vital and alive to-day than ever it was before. It has gained enormous access of popular strength, and is fully responsive to the needs of the people. The old complaint about the League being a reactionary body has ceased to be heard. The creed of the League has been recast to suit the charged political conditions, and it has now become a thoroughly reliable and powerful organ of Moslem public opinion. Indeed, the promptitude with which it has shaped itself to meet to the popular forces has alarmed a few of the old-fashioned men in the Moslem community, some of whom are obsessed by the craven fear lest they should soon find their old occupations gone. They accuse the League of having been bitten with revolutionary ideas, and this is perhaps the surest testimony to the fact that the Moslem political organisation has now become thoroughly communal. It was a right instinct that led H. H. the Aga Khan to observe on a memorable occasion that a permanent President of the League had become an anachronism in view of the growing political consciousness of the Moslem democracy. Much yet remains to be done to make the League an efficient instrument of the will of the community, but there can be no question that it enjoys the greatest measure of public confidence to-day and is the most representative organisation of its kind in this country.

We have been forced to make these observations at some length because the position that the League has recently come to hold in relation to communal work is not yet fully secure from the wily attacks of a species of its critics who were wont, not long ago, to trade on the confidence and goodwill of the Moslem community. Mussalmans need not be reminded of the commonplace that the utility, efficiency and prestige of all organised political work depend on the degree of solidarity, public spirit and disciplined energy displayed by the workers. The future success of the Moslem League rests on three obvious postulates. It should be the most reliable exponent of Moslem public opinion; it should command the devoted services of the ablest men in the community; it should be efficiently organised. Now, those who watched the proceedings of the last annual session of the League at Agra are perfectly aware that the League is becoming popular in the real sense, that it has now behind it the daily increasing support of Moslem democracy. It is also manifest that it now commands the services of some of the most energetic and able workers among Mussalmans. What it still lacks is efficient organisation. The utility of the political work done by the League will not attain to its full proportions as long as its machinery remains imperfect. The central organisation should have well-defined relations with the provincial and district organisations affiliated to it, and while allowing perfect freedom of initiative and action to all its branches in matters of local concern, it should exercise efficient control in all things relating to the general policy and principles of which it is the sole authoritative exponent. Its views and decisions represent the judgment of the entire Moslem community in India, and it should not tolerate any tampering with its authority by persons who are carrying on a purely personal propaganda under questionable disguises often at the instance of others who are as hostile to Moslem as to other Indian aspirations. It should enforce discipline with some rigour at this stage if it wants to make its future work useful and effective.

The existing lack of efficient organisation and discipline in the All-India Moslem League is due to various causes. The main cause has arisen from the fact that the League has only recently had to restate its policy and purpose in obedience to popular wishes. The amplification of its creed less than two years ago led to some conflict of opinion, which, however, never became serious or acute. The new programme satisfied an overwhelming majority of Mussalmans and the feeble voice of dissent was soon hushed in the general acclamation of the people. It is a remarkable fact that hardly a defection has taken place from the ranks of the League since it publicly declared the new formula of its faith. It is safe to conclude, therefore, that there is a practical unanimity among the constituents of the League about the ideals that it has in view. The situation, however, furnished a few of the self-seeking among its ranks with a new handle to serve their own personal ends. They fear to go out of the League lest they should sink into obscurity and be utterly wiped out of public life. "Assenting with civil leer" they have elected to remain in. They are shrewd enough to perceive that they will have ample opportunities within the fold of the League to create "scenes" and situations which they know how to turn to profitable account. It is this timorous breed of "leaders" who are surreptitiously using every means to undermine discipline and weaken the authority of the League. The time has now come that the League, in the interests of its own efficiency, should deal drastically with all cases in which its decisions have been flouted or its basic principles set at naught. A few cases of this character have just acquired some notoriety and it is necessary to unmask their true features to public notice.

The Hon. Mr. Mohamed Shafi, Secretary of the Punjab Provincial League, got his executive committee some days ago to "place on record its emphatic protest" in the shape of a huge resolution, and lost no time in having it published in the Press. The "protest" relates to the "appointment, by the Indian League, independently and over the heads of the various provincial leagues, of committees" for the purpose of raising the Moslem National Fund, the establishment of which was decided upon by the All-India Moslem League at its Agra session. Mr. Shafi's committee "considers it absolutely necessary that the work to be done in this connection in the various provinces should be left to the provincial leagues alone." Mr. Shafi himself in his letter forwarding his committee's resolution to the Secretary of the All-India Moslem League, says: "The appointment, by the central body, of these 'provincial committees over the heads of the various provincial leagues was so obviously opposed to axiomatic principles on which alone an All-India organisation can be smoothly worked and constituted such a slight on the provincial leagues themselves that I considered it my duty to place your letter before the executive committee of the Punjab Moslem League at its meeting held on 'Sunday the 19th instant (May)'. Now, it would be interesting to recall the circumstances relating to the appointment of the committees for the collection of the Moslem National Fund. As we have said, it was unanimously resolved at a meeting of the All-India Moslem League at Agra to raise a permanent fund for political work. The representatives of all the provincial leagues were present on the occasion including the Hon. Mr. Shafi. The provincial committees were appointed in consultation with the provincial representatives. When the appointment of the Punjab committee was being discussed, Mr. Shafi succeeded almost in creating a scene by refusing to accept Mr. Zafar Ali Khan as a member, with the result that the matter was left to be settled by the Punjab representatives themselves while they were at Agra. Mr. Fazl-i-Hussain, Barrister-at-law of Lahore, gave a list to the Hon. Secretary of the All-India Moslem League on the following day, stating that their mutual differences had been settled and the names contained in the list were acceptable to all. But now that the time for practical effort has come and printed lists of the members of the provincial committees have been circulated with a view to get them to work, Mr. Shafi takes up a garrulous attitude and protests against the action of the central League. It is manifest that all the other provincial leagues have accepted the decisions reached at Agra without the least objection. They are neither aware of any violation of "axiomatic principles" nor of the alleged "slight" that is now apparently causing Mr. Shafi some sleepless nights. Mr. Shafi participated fully in the discussion about the appointment of the Punjab committee. He did not talk then of "slight" and "axiomatic principles." His only objection related to the inclusion of Mr. Zafar Ali Khan in the committee as one of its members. He had made a public confession of his peculiarity of character by declaring that he could not work with the Editor of the Zamindar, and had gone even so far as to say that the Mussalmans of the "aristocratic" class in the Punjab would be equally unwilling to work with him. The Punjab "aristocrats" present then instantly repudiated this unblushing imputation on their public spirit and sense of duty. The Punjab committee was eventually formed with the knowledge and approval of Mr. Shafi and it never occurred to him till after full five months that its appointment offended against "axiomatic principles" and constituted a "slight" to the amour propre of his committee and his league.

Mr. Shafi's tactics would have ranked as consummate exercises in the art of party manœuvring, if only they had some dash of courage behind them. But the fates have cast him in a mould that is not decidedly heroic. During the past few years a series of exasperating situations have sprung upon him, like bolts from the blue, which would have sufficed to disconcert a man of staidier nerve than he. His training as a public man has not proved adequate to the needs of those situations and the spectacle of his slight from position to position in search of some reliable cover has not been altogether edifying. He has talked in turn of his order, of respect due to constituted authority, of moderation and constructive work, even of political reform, administrative changes and self-government. He has tried every catchword of the hour and tested the value of every straw that has floated past him on the crest of the popular waves. The pathos of his situation is that he is capable of feeling all the Ulsteria of Sir Edward Carson's creation without having the quality of the Last-Ditcher. That is why most of his attempts to create a brief noise about himself have ended in a public laugh at his expense.

One must not, however, ignore the fact that Mr. Shafi controls an executive committee that is obedient to his will. The resolution relating to the Moslem National Fund was passed at a meeting of the committee attended by Mr. Shafi and three other gentlemen who have no pretensions to any weight or influence in public affairs. Mr. Shafi practically rules the roost in the Punjab League, thanks to his success in having so far kept out of the League most of the younger generation of workers whose capacity and independence of character are beyond question. With the general body of the League composed mostly of men of stereotyped views and indifferent intellectual equipments and with a committee mainly packed with his supporters, Mr. Shafi may have his way in recording protests and reeling off grandiloquent "resolutions" by the dozen. But for the sake of his own reputation as a public man he should come down from the fence and define his position. Let him openly come forward and defy the All-India Moslem League if he dares. Let him frankly unbosom himself and tell the Moslem public what he wants. These questionable tactics of his are doing no good either to him or to the community that he claims to serve. The collection of the Moslem National Fund may wait indefinitely; but Mr. Shafi must vent his personal spite against Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, and should in the last resort take shelter behind "axiomatic principles" and imaginay "slights" simply to thwart the progress of an important communal undertaking. His dread of association with Mr. Zafar Ali Khan recalls to our mind another equally amusing episode that dates back to the annual session of the All-India Moslem League at Karachi in 1907. The Punjab Moslem League had not yet come into existence, but Mr. Shafi had already picked up a quarrel with Mr. Fazl-i-Husain about the formation of the provincial branch. The contending parties fought their rival claims with considerable virulence at Karachi and some efforts were made by men from other provinces to induce the Punjab stalwarts to compose their mutual differences and work harmoniously together. But Mr. Shafi and Mr. Shah Din would not yield, and the latter declared that he would not work in an organisation of which Mr. Fazl-i-Husain was also a member. Mr. Shafi's outburst of petty egotism at Agra was evidently inspired by a pardonable desire to imitate the superior manner of his learned cousin. We trust, however, that he is free from the vanity of imagining that he is indispensable. If not, he is under a cruel illusion. At all events, if he thinks he is well-advised in the choice of his tactics and methods of work, he should throw a bold, open challenge to those who differ from him and test his position. If he is sure of his ground, why does he not stump the country with his gospel of salvation and come back to power borne on the shoulders of devoted multitudes? His existing methods of conducting the affairs of the Punjab League cannot obviously be allowed to go on. The League has got to be democratised and made an energetic and disciplined body that would do some real work for the people on approved lines and not exist simply to give weight and prestige to the evolutions of a peculiarly self-conscious and self-complacent individual.

The other case to which we want to make a brief reference relates to the formation of a district Moslem League at Etawah to which some amount of noisy publicity has been given in the papers. The promoters of the new organisation are reported to have declared that they have no faith in the ideal of self-government adopted by the All-India Moslem League and approve in this respect the attitude of the U. P. Provincial League. The Etawah report gives prominence to a certain Mr. Amir Ali. We do not know who this gentleman is, unless he is the paid clerk in the office of the U. P. League. If so, we would like to know what business has this person to go about touring in districts at public expense with a view to bolster up mushroom organisations, which presume to dictate policy and principles to the whole community and its all-India political organ? The principles laid down by the central organisation must be accepted by all its affiliated branches. If any branch does not make a clear declaration to the effect that it approves of the basic creed of the League, it should not be allowed affiliation. The U. P. League, which appears to have become a nest of intrigue and personal wrangles, should be called to account for the opposition which some of its office-bearers have set up against the declared policy of the parent League, and of which they are making a public parade. If the U. P. League refuses to fall into line with the central organisation it should be disaffiliated at once, and a new organisation in perfect harmony with the general will of the community should be created in its place. It is really strange that the Mussalmans of the United Provinces, who form the most educated and progressive portion of the Moslem community, should have such a provincial League masquerading in their name. Sham organisations, run on lines of individual self-interest, cannot be allowed to exist under the wings of the All-India Moslem League. They should either be mended or ended.

CORRESPONDENCE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—It gratified me very much to see that my suggestion for an India House in London has been so warmly approved by Mr. Pollak. There could be no more capable and broadminded witness to what is conducive to the defence of Indian interests than Mr. Pollak. For my own part, I am more than ever convinced that it is impossible for Indian opinion to produce any real effect upon the administration of the Empire or upon the leading minds of universal civilisation until India possesses in London—the great meeting place of the world's opinions—a permanent residence and centre for her accredited representatives in the great Metropolis, and for the promotion of the commerce, art and science of the Indian nation. India should, of course, always remain, and must always remain, the seat and origin, as well as the vast arena, for the development of every Indian movement which deserves the name of Indian. There must be, and there can be, no displacing and no undervaluing of the supreme centre of all-Indian patriotism and progress which must always be India herself. In dealing, however, with the plain and real facts that the well-being of the peoples of India largely depends upon the public and governing opinion at London, it is mere childishness and folly to neglect the means of bringing before the multitudinous opinion of London the fundamental necessities of the Indian situation.

To be understood by London you must be known in London; and it is not from occasional paragraphs or superficial correspondence in the Times or the Standard that the public opinion of England can be adequately informed upon the wants and the wishes of India and the Indian representatives. Even though closely connected with the English people and governing classes, speaking the same language, sharing the same institutions, the whole of the great Dominions attached to England, such as Canada and Australia, have their official residences and Government agencies in London; and it would be impossible for Canada and Australia to obtain proper attention for their requirements if they had not proper centres of their interests off Kingsway and near Westminster.

A stately palace for an All-India Agency, with offices for important departments, with halls and committee rooms for general and private business, with an annexe for artistic and commercial exhibitions, which would promote the material interests of economic India; such an India House is an absolute necessity, and would not only be directly beneficial to India, but would be of the greatest possible use to English public opinion by providing a well-known centre for every kind of useful knowledge and information about the condition of India. All the existing institutions and societies for the benefit of India would naturally gather around India House. In the great reading room there would be the newspapers of India together with all the books which are the most useful sources of information on every subject of the public welfare.

The large number of Indian princes who now visit London, and who are obliged to spend their time in wandering aimlessly around the maze of English festivities and amusements, would here have a centre at which they could repay under Indian conditions the hospitality accorded to them. Here, too, Indian princes and statesmen residents or visitors in London, would be able to bring English friends to become acquainted with the realities of Indian opinion and nationality.

There would, naturally, grow up around such a representative centre of Indian feeling and sentiment the regular habit of having certain times in the year specially devoted to representative meetings of Indian representatives and English friends and supporters of India belonging to all classes and parties in English society. At present the friends of India have literally nowhere, where they can meet authorised representatives, or where they can invite the English public to become acquainted with the requirements of India.

Let me assume for instance that there was an Indian Week every year in the month of June, when London is most crowded with the representatives of England, India and all foreign nations besides. Within your great India House you would have authorised and representative exponents of Indian opinion, supported by the numerous men of distinction in English society who at present have no centre of action for the better enlightenment of the English public. Great princes and nobles of India, distinguished politicians and professional men from India would naturally add to the attraction and distinction of the June conferences at India House. The National Congress of India, the All-India Moslem League and similar great organisations would be able to send their deputations and delegates to the public conferences at India House. There is no reason why you should not have a great newspaper containing the best news of India and the world at large, written by distinguished writers, and disseminated not only among Indians but among many hundreds or thousands of Englishmen, Scotsmen, and Irishmen, who at present never see an organ of Indian nationality from one end of the year to the other.

Such an India House would require to be built and maintained with a magnificent dignity worthy of that mighty Empire of three hundreds of millions of people possessing such illustrious princes, such a great and ancient nobility, such professional and commercial classes with the education and the intelligence capable of developing the highest requirements of their great and wonderful country. The ground and the building would not cost less than £100,000. Another sum of £100,000 should form a permanent endowment for the payment of an adequate staff of administrators and officers. There should be trained lecturers capable of presenting the wants of the Indian peoples with learning and eloquence before English audiences. There should be a system of election or nomination in India by which every two years, for instance, representatives of the highest character and ability would be sent from India to represent for a couple of years or more the interests of the various countries of the Indian Motherland. India House would thus be always able to supply the Houses of Lords and Commons with adequate information on every subject of Indian importance. The great popular associations and organisations in England, the trades unions, the commercial organisations, the brotherhoods and leagues of various kinds which are so numerous and influential in England, would all be the object of the solicitude of the Indian representatives in London; and on every great question and great interest of Hindustan thousands of English friends would receive adequate information from the committee at India House. India House would be the Supreme Insurance Society for Indian interests spreading the light of truth, refuting falsehoods, and bringing the princes and peoples of India into direct connection with all that is best in English society. Nor should it be forgotten that the representatives of European opinion, the newspapers of France, Germany, etc., would always be able to receive in the most interesting manner the latest news about a great Asiatic country so important politically, commercially, and intellectually to the progressive nations of the world. A quarter of a century ago the great Lord Beaconsfield brought the Indian regiments to Malta in the interests of the common Empire. In the interests of the common Empire as well as of the wonderful Motherland of India, let an INDIA HOUSE arise near Westminster in order to convince even the most superficial and unreflecting that India is great, that India is progressive, that India cherishes her mighty past as well as her mighty future, and that the peoples of England and India would know one another better for their mutual advantage.

Yours faithfully,

F. HUGH O'DONNELL OF O'DONNELL.

A night in the Balkans.

(BY A MEMBER OF THE ALL-INDIA MEDICAL MISSION TO TURKEY.)

It was on a cold, wintry night towards the end of January 1913, that I left my tent about 10 p. m. to have a friendly chat with the Kurdish officers encamped at a distance of 2 or 3 miles around us.

Our tents were pitched under the shelter of a hillock, some miles rearward from the headquarters of the General Commanding the Ottoman forces at Chataldja.

Our men had finished their day's work and were now retiring to bed to refresh and prepare themselves for the next day's labour.

The Orient Express, which before the war went as far as Sofia and even beyond, now worked up only to Hademkeui, the Turkish headquarters. The line was intact as far as Saiyakteppeh and the fortifications on the left coast and beyond it had been blown up at numerous places for 50 yards apace, the bridges dynamited and the railway buildings levelled to the ground.

It passed our tents at a distance of nearly 200 yards only and so we could have the latest news both from the front and the Capital. For some days past rumours had been rife that hostilities were to commence again with the Allies and we expected daily to hear at any moment the noise and thunder of the cannonade. Still, however, days wore on and there was no sign that we were on the eve of the resumption of hostilities.

On the day in question the results of our enquiries at the railway station were more conflicting than ever. In the afternoon I happened to go for a stroll on the hillocks near by and heard the quick-fires rattling in the distance. Quickly I stretched myself on the ground and tried to locate the direction whence the firing proceeded. I made out soon that the sound came from the direction of the Kurdish artillery, some of whose officers were known to me. I turned my foot-steps thither and ran as fast as my tight breeches, heavy boots and the condition of the ground permitted.

In my great hurry I had lost my bearings and was only stopped when a Turkish private from a sudden ambush bid me halt. On ascending higher ground I saw that I was in the range of the firing-line. I soon learnt that the artillery men were engaged at gunnery practice. In still greater hurry I had to withdraw and by a circuitous route arrived at the place whence the firing proceeded.

I approached the officers covered both with perspiration and mud—the latter was always more than ankle-deep. I was repaid for my trouble many times over by the hearty welcomes accorded to me by the Kurdish and the Turkish officers. The mechanism and the working of the various guns were explained to me and some additional rounds were fired to illustrate the actual working of the weapons. I was then introduced to some of the junior officers and we repaired to the tent of the Major of the regiment to partake in the usual, tiny cups, of the delicious Turkish coffee.

Our conversation ranged over all sorts of topics and it finally came round to the subject that lay nearest to the hearts of all of us, viz., the war and the chance of the resumption of hostilities.

There were diverse views and conflicting estimates of the future course of events. But all were united in the one eager hope that the Turks might have one more chance of grappling with the enemy, one more opportunity on which they were ready to stake their all. Barring the little difference, that while the young were only too eager to come to instant grip with the enemy, the experienced heads wished to bide their time and wait till the season grew more propitious, there was absolute unanimity about the continuation of the war, and anxiety at the thought that, after all, hostilities might not be resumed. La guerre, sans doute, la guerre. When I was leaving the Kurdish camp, as I had to return soon to my duties, however small, and to the party that I belonged to, the officers asked me that evening to dinner and said that perhaps they would be able to impart me some information about the war. My time was not my own. I promised to call again in the evening, but said that I could not be certain about the dinner. After the usual enquiries at the railway station, which had raised our hopes of the war, I found myself, electric-torch in hand, picking my way back to my camp carefully amidst the falling snow and the biting wind of the Balkans. Luck was, however, against me that evening. I missed the footpath by which I had come and which I had carefully noted before along the hard ground of the hillock. It was now covered with snow, and in spite of my best efforts to find out the direction, I strayed helplessly into the head-quarters of an Arab regiment some miles off. I enquired from the soldiers of the Commander's place and was taken to a moderately big tent or chablar, as the Turks call it, where a brisk fire gave the place a most comfortable look.

A tough, middle-aged Arab warrior was stretched on a portable sofa and was suffering from fever and headache. I was in a very awkward position. I had thrust myself in a sick man's room and, consistent with politeness, I could not hurriedly depart. I faced the situation as best I could and apologised to the gentleman for my unpardonable intrusion. Think of my dismay at the effect my words produced on him. When I entered the place, he had said pardonnez moi, monsieur, but I had stopped his efforts to seat himself by urging that, as he was unwell, he should not worry himself about a mere formality. But hearing my apologies he realised how I was feeling and instantly raised himself in the bed. All my entreaties were drowned in his loud-voiced orders to the soldiers to be quick about the coffee and tea. I felt thankful to my that day's star, notwithstanding the previous misadventure. Soon the tense and unpleasant feeling passed away when he began to chat freely and most good-humoredly.

When I left him he gave me his card and pressed on me an invitation to dinner the next day with him and the officers of his regiment. He gave me, also, a soldier or Askar, who accompanied me to the camp of the Kurds, where I guessed the dinner would be over and thought uncomfortably of passing a cold night, with lessened energy, on an empty stomach. I had expected great things at the dinner, especially meat, to which we had been strangers for sometime past, but my blunder had served me well. A night's fast is by no means a severe punishment for careless eyes and a wandering mind.

Reaching the artillery quarters, I was recognised by the men who immediately conveyed information of my arrival to their officers. As I reached the officers' camp I saw a group of them waiting outside in the falling snow. They greeted my appearance with outstretched hands and I was deeply touched by their affection. I, a stranger amongst them, of a different country, nationality and race, was treated by them as if I were one of their own kiths and kins. The only bond that invited us was Islam and that had removed all distinctions of country, rank and relationship.

They told me that they had not yet dined and were only waiting for me. Men helped me to take off my goloshes, long-boots and my rainproof, while I took a snug seat in a corner near the fire, thinking out the best way for offering my apology. But as I came to know later, my companion, the Arab soldier, had done it in a far better manner than I could have ever done. When questioned as to who he was and to what regiment he belonged, he had given an account of my untimely, nocturnal visit to the sick officer. When they heard of my misadventure all had a good, hearty laugh and I, instead of being the apologisee, was the recipient of a good deal of warm and sincere sympathy.

I enjoyed the dinner as I had never done before and a great zest was added to it by the information that my friends had received their marching orders. With every one in the best of spirits, it was a most pleasant gathering. We dined late and well.

After the dinner, the fragrant Turkish cigarettes and coffee had their round till nearly 3 o'clock in the morning. We talked of the course of the war till the armistice had been arranged and of the course it was likely to take if resumed. The Kurds are primarily a warlike people, and their warlike customs and traditions, that the meanest soldiers in the army is expected to observe, were most interesting for me to learn. Major Zia Bey told us that the Kurds, in times gone by, in hand to hand fight, would bind the lapels of their coats to each other's so that no idea unbecoming a soldier may enter their head and that they may either kill or die in good straight fight. Amongst them it was not accounted creditable to be merely brave, but the palm was given only to the bravest of the braves. A second test of the utility of the Kurdish soldier was the length of time which he could live without any nourishment. The third and the hardest test was his endurance of bad weather and fatigue.

Indeed, it was difficult to realise a poor soldier's lot who had to undergo great privation and hardship and live months after months on coarse bread soaked in water. The only luxury available to him was a little bit of stale cheese, added every now and then.

It was getting late and was high time for the junior officers to depart, for early that morning they had to leave for the front.

We parted, to meet no more and we bade each other affectionate farewell.

Then the Major and I chatted alone for about half an hour. He said that it was the weary waiting before the actual fight that ate into a soldier's heart—months of weary waiting and no sight of the enemy. That was the hardest lot of a soldier. "We depart to-morrow," he said, "we know not whither. But we pray to God that every moment may bring us nearer to the enemy. We have had reverses, suffered humiliations, and the loss of honour. May it please Almighty God to grant us a moment to retrieve our honour and strike in the defence of our country. Death or life, but one moment of the enemy's presence would repay all these months of anxious and weary waiting."

"All rests in His Hand who is the Maker of all."

Ghasita : a Budmash.

III.—The Intercepted Dowry.

In my last story concerning Ghasita and his career of crime, that personage was safely lodged in the house of a friendly Sonar, whose place of business was situated in a back alley of the suburb of Tajgunj—a mohalla of average size and chiefly inhabited by persons who derived a living by selling mementoes of the lovely mausoleum whence their abode derives its name, or who were in some way or another connected with the up-keep of the gardens and the marble tomb sacred to the memory of the Mumtaz-i-Mahal, the "Exalted one of the Palace", otherwise known as Arjmand Banu Begum or, in the affectionate familiarity of the populace, as "Taj Bibi", the Lady of one of the most beautiful architectural triumphs in the world. Tajgunj was not a bad place for a fugitive from the Law to seek shelter, as the immediate neighbourhood is broken up by ravines running down to the Jumna, the population of the suburb is small, and a man could lie perdu there for sometime without much fear of his hiding place being detected. The Sonar—timorous as are most of that caste—was far from being pleased at the arrival of Ghasita, especially when the latter coolly informed him of his having murdered a constable the preceding night. But any intention of closing his doors to the Kachi, or betraying his presence in Tajgunj to the Police, was abandoned on Ghasita mentioning sundry transactions in which the Sonar had played an important part; knowledge about which the convict had gained while in the Central Jail. So Manphul made the best of a bad job, and showed his visitor into a tiny back-room, where he could stay in security until the first hue and cry subsided. Owing to his house being close to the thana at Tajgunj, the Sonar was frequently called to the aid of the Police in the character of witness to a house-search; to sign as to the correctness of articles found in possession of any person under arrest; or to help in the weighing of gold and silver ornaments recovered from thieves or robbers. He figured on such occasions as a "mutabar admi"—a respectable individual, and perhaps was not far below the moral standard of such witnesses to the integrity and upright doings of the subordinate Police. He was, therefore, in a position to hear news about the recent murder and keep Ghasita au fait as to the method being adopted to capture him, if suspicion should have attached itself to the Kachi with reference to that deed of blood. It was not many days before a second proclamation might have been noticed on the boards outside the Police station, in which the name of Ghasita figured as prominently as in the former placard announcing his escape from Jail. Some of the people he had met on the night of the murder at Duhuki para—shortly previous to that occurrence—had given a fairly accurate description of his looks, and the similarity of the man they described with the personal appearance of the escaped convict was soon observed by an intelligent Sub-Inspector. The reward for the arrest of Ghasita now rose to Rs. 200, a sum which the Sonar would have been delighted to earn had he not stood in great awe of his dangerous lodger. Enforced captivity within the narrow precincts of a small, stuffy kothri proved more than the impatient spirit of Ghasita could bear for a lengthy period, so by the time a fortnight had slipped by, he used to sally forth after nightfall and roam among the old ruins that stand as monuments of past greatness along the road leading from Tajgunj to the Agra Fort. There were the crumbling walls of a mansion once tenanted by Todar Mull, that clever Kayasth from Laherpur in Oudh, who acted as Revenue Member to Akhbar and whose general lines of fiscal administration serve still as a basis for the British procedure with regard to the same difficult problem of land valuation and assessment of revenue justly due to Government. There again, one saw the decaying abode of Rajah Jai Singh, noted for his astronomical tastes as well as his being the founder of the modern city of Jaipur, after Amber—that hoary town perched on the barren hill sides was quitted by the Jadon Rajputs for a new capital.

Lack of ready money alone hindered Ghasita from once more taking the road and replenishing his empty girdle at the expense of some rich traveller. Since the Police records must contain a list of all his near relatives, including the family of Kachis in Lohamandi bazar, the idea of his venturing to visit that locality was much too daring to render it probable, so Ghasita felt that it would be perfectly safe to proceed there at night and have a chat with Nasibun, the girl who imagined him as a persecuted hero of romance. Accordingly he put that scheme into practice and experienced no interruption in his stolen interview with that damsel, while she gave him some news likely to prove of considerable value in the near future. Nasibun was employed to sell vegetables at the cantonment station by the merchant who had got a contract for that work from the Railway authorities, and thus spent many hours on the platform, listening to the talk of the railway servants and gleaning odd scraps of information about doings on the line. Among other details, she casually informed Ghasita that a wedding was about to be celebrated in the house of the Indian Assistant Station Master, and that great preparations were in progress for holding this ceremony in grand style. The salary of the bride's father might seem an insignificant sum, yet he had his allotted share—his hak—of the unearned increment derived by most of the station staff and divided in accordance with the unwritten law on the subject. The 10th of November had been fixed for the arrival of the bridegroom's party from some place down the line, but the dowry and wedding gifts would be collected in the house where resided the bride with her parents—a set of hideous red brick quarters about fifty yards distant from the railway station itself. Greatly interested by what Nasibun told him, the possibility of breaking into the place in question and carrying off such cash and jewelry as he could lay his hands on, made Ghasita revolve many plans in his mind. From talks with dacoit leaders in jail he had learnt that in the majority of instances their capture had been effected by treachery on the part of some member of the gang led by greedy longing for a good reward, fear of Police oppression, or perhaps to revenge some insult or rough treatment often led a dacoit to play the informer and reveal to the authorities the whereabouts and identity of "the leader of his gang. So Ghasita determined to work—a sound rule—on "his own," and thus have no companions to claim a portion of the spoil, or false friends to betray him in the hopes of handling the Government reward for his arrest. But dacoiting a house, where several persons were sure to be collected together and which stood so near to the railway station and—still worse—to the lines of the Agra Police Reserve, was not a job to be undertaken single-handed, and he wondered where he could find a few kindred spirits to join him in the crime he now contemplated. Bidding Nasibun adieu, after promising to see her again ten days hence—it being now the end of October—he returned to his refuge in Tajgunj to think matters over and find a suitable method for robbing the Assistant Station Master of the portable property certain to be at his house in readiness for the coming of the bridegroom and his friends.

In his character as a receiver of stolen property Manphul used to be visited by men of the butmash class, who came mysteriously to his house at night and were taken by the Sonar into an inner room for the transaction of business too strictly private in nature to be dealt with in the outer shop. Long absence from Agra had put Ghasita quite out of touch with his quondam allies in crime, most of whom had either begun to live honestly, had left for other parts of the country or—and these perhaps were in a majority—were safely locked up in jail. No alternative remained except to confide in his host and explain that he wanted introduction to a few men of the right sort—thereby meaning scoundrels who would not hesitate to commit any offence in the Penal Code, from cheating to murder—to join in a promising enterprise with a large booty to be divided when the affair was brought off satisfactorily. Manphul asked no awkward questions, not wishing to learn particulars of the villany Ghasita had in view, but made the latter faithfully swear that a certain percentage of the proceeds from his criminal undertaking would be handed over to the Sonar, independent of the portion of the swag given him at ruinously cheap rate to dispose of. To deposit jewelry in the melting pot and despatch Currency Notes to a Calcutta correspondent for passing in that distant centre of trade—these were not the least profitable parts of Manphul's trade and he had been too long at the game to make any mistake in this branch of his business. By the middle of November, Ghasita had made the acquaintance of four professional burglars and deemed that number sufficient for the prosecution of his plans. He ascertained from Nasibun that on the 20th of that month, the bridal party were expected to arrive from Farruckabad by a train that reached the Cantonment station between six and seven A. M. The Assistant Station Master, a Kayasth by caste, had made all preparations for the reception of the bride and her relatives, and cash and trinkets were sure to be in his house awaiting the ceremony of betrothal. From the same source he learnt that a Troop Special—conveying a British regiment to take part in some manoeuvres at the Meerut Camp of Exercise—was timed to pass through about 1 A. M. and that the Assistant Station Master had been detailed for duty on that occasion, so would be away from his quarters for some little time. The only other male members of his household were two lads, still in their "teens" and a semi-crippled grandfather, hence the opposition to be overcome was very trifling. Ghasita had not made a confidant of Nasibun, yet her woman's wit soon led her to guess why he asked the questions he did about matters in no wise concerning him, unless he meant mischief towards the subject of his inquiries. The nights are pretty cold in northern India in November and a dense fog often rises at that season of the year, lasting from after sunset till within an hour or two of dawn. By having five persons concerned in the raid on the valuables of the Assistant Station Master, the crime became, as enjoined by Sec. 895 of the Penal Code, a dacoity, punishment for which offence is of a slightly severer character than for ordinary housebreaking, but Ghasita flattered himself that his scheme was too carefully planned to admit the chance of detection or arrest.

The drivers of hackney carriages in a military Cantonment are almost a class by themselves: usually Mahomedans of the most disreputable type and accustomed to act with lawless vigour and without much fear of consequences—a fact due to having to deal with Tommy Atkins, a somewhat rough customer, though in reality his bark is infinitely worse than his bite, and if he does curse and cuff individuals exciting his wrath, nevertheless makes amends by the ease with which it is possible to swindle him in matters of payment. A driver accordingly had repaired to a cluster of small bungalows, tenanted by Government pensioners, chiefly retired Eurasians, and there stayed—as if waiting for a fare well wanted. His place of tarrying was within easy distance of the railway quarters and on the main road leading from the Cantonment Station to the military lines and Sudder Bazar. The four other members of the gang were told to repair by separate routes to an appointed rendezvous, under an old tree that grew on some waste land adjoining the railway line, and not more than hundred yards from the house it was intended to break into. On the night chosen for the dacoity, five men might have been seen—had not a heavy mist rendered things invisible at a distance of over ten yards—seated in conclave under the tree. Ghasita carried his Winchester, skillfully hidden beneath a long dirty overcoat—made out of rough blanketting—while his companions had lathis and one of them a tulwar. They anticipated little difficulty in getting into the house, surrounded by a brick wall of about eight feet high and with wooden doors unlikely to resist strong pressure from outside. One of the gang stole forward to watch for the exit on duty of the Assistant Station Master, whose departure was to be the signal for beginning active operations. The railway employee was sure to take a lantern to help him on his way to the station, and prevent him from tripping over wires or falling into a pit on the journey. The chimes from the big clock on the Roman Catholic cathedral had scarcely finished ringing out twelve, when the spy came back to report that the hour for their work had come, the Station Master having just left his house and gone off to his post of duty. Stealthily approaching the building, Ghasita made one of the others give him a leg up and soon managed to scale the low wall. Sitting astride of its narrow coping, he noticed the glimmer of a country lamp, the humble chiragh, within the house and heard female voices. Doubtless the women folk had awoken when the master of the premises started out, and were indulging in conversation prior to resuming their disturbed slumbers. Giving a hand to pull up his comrades, one by one the gang surmounted the wall and Ghasita dropping down into the little front courtyard, was soon busy in forcing open the main door, not very securely fastened, so offering scant resistance to the sturdy shoving of the dacoit. Once inside the place it was easy to seize the womenfolk and lads, threatening them with immediate death should they attempt to raise an alarm. Nor were the frightened creatures likely to do so, for the sudden apparition of the dacoits, the ferocity on the coarse features of the leader and their utter helplessness compelled them to sit cowering on the mud floor, while the robbers commenced ransacking the room and breaking open a strong chest in which they, rightly enough, thought the property they sought must be hidden. Unfortunately Ghasita forgot the existence of the grandmother, who slept in another tiny apartment at the back of the house and who—like most old people—was awakened by the smallest noise. She heard the door broken in and the fierce warnings given by the gang, so with a wonderful agility for her years, managed to lift the latch of another door opening on to a bit of ground where the family had planted a few marigolds—the gendas used for garlanding an image of Vishnu or some other god of the Hindu pantheon—and a plant of sacred basil (tulshi) which on certain festivals adorned a rudely carved lingam, also object of worship by the pious Kayasth and his relatives. To cross the space intervening between the house and the wire fencing that marked off the railway land; to scramble through that barrier and painfully climb the steep embankment did not prove a task beyond the powers of the excited orone. Once on the line, she was not many paces from the distant signal and points where a Jemadar—as the pointsman is called in Indian railway parlance—stood after seeing that everything was ready for the safe passing of the Troop Train, due in another five minutes. Her shrieks of "Chor-Chor, Daku agya" ran out on the night air with surprising vigour and were audible for a long way in the perfect stillness that prevailed. The sentry on the Police magazine shouted for the Guard to turn out; the sound of men moving hurriedly about in the lines, orders being given in half a dozen different voices and directions, showed the dacoits that they had better depart as quickly as possible, although not all the booty had been discovered and taken possession of. Ghasita did not lack pluck, so delayed leaving the house till the sound of men running up told him that it was high time to make good his escape. Emerging from the courtyard, his figure was seen by the Jemadar, who told him to stop at once. A shower of abuse followed by a warning not to advance a step further, was the only answer he received. Not perceiving that the dacoit was armed, the Pointsman—a sturdy Rajput from Ajmere—bravely kept on his way and got within a couple of yards of Ghasita when the latter taking deliberate aim shot the luckless man dead in his tracks. Though the report of the rifle increased the bustle in the Police lines, it served to deter some other railway men from coming any nearer, so Ghasita rushed away into the enveloping fog and made straight for the spot where the gharry was in readiness to bear him and his associates away from the scene of their crime. Some sowars had mounted, without pausing to saddle their horses, but were obliged to make a considerable detour to reach the Station Master's quarters, owing to a long stretch of wire fencing that demarcated Police and railway territories. By the time the constables and sowars arrived to find the corpse of the dead Jemadar and to obtain from the terrified people some idea of what had occurred, and whether the dacoits had fled, Ghasita and his "pals" were being conveyed at full speed towards the barracks, the Kachi cleverly choosing that road since he knew that soldiers invariably made the driver urge his steeds to the utmost, so their rapid pace would not cause surprise, which it would inevitably have done had they gone in the direction of the Civil Lines or the city. Nearing the Cantonment church, he stopped the gharry, bade a hasty farewell to his companions, after ordering them to meet him that night at the house of the Sonar to get their share of the stolen property, and then—shouldering the cash and ornaments which he had tied up in a sort of bundle, using a chudhar belonging to one of the women for that purpose—Ghasita walked calmly along the road leading to Tajgunj, halted amid some ruins in one of the ravines, placed the booty in what he deemed a secure cache, unlikely to be noticed or interfered with for the next twenty-four hours at any—rate, and was knocking at the door of his lodgings before the sows had got on the track of the gharry, whose noisy rattling had not escaped their attention, but which they failed to overtake or catch sight of. Having killed a fellow creature did not hinder Ghasita from enjoying a sound sleep, and it was midday ere he got up, went to the well to perform the usual ablutions and then told the Sonar to have some food prepared for his benefit. Manphul had visited Tajgunj thana that morning and news of the dacoity and murder had come while he was engaged in amicable conversation with the officer in charge. Congratulating the Darogha-ji on the absence of bardmashes of that sort in the circle under his vigilant care, he returned to his shop, more anxious than ever to see the last of a tenant with such dangerous habits as Ghasita: for he had little doubt of that worthy being mixed up in the crime of the previous night. Some days, however, had yet to elapse before host and guest were destined to part company.—A. N. G.

LORD CURZON'S APPEAL TO LONDON.

A LARGE and influential meeting was held at the Mansion House in mail week under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, in support of the School of Oriental Studies. Among the speakers were the Marquess of Crewe, Earl Curzon, Lord Reay, Lord Incheape, and Sir Montagu Turner, and the attendance included the Persian Minister, the First Secretary of the Turkish Embassy, Viscount Peel, Lord Redesdale, Lord Lamington, Lord Sydenham, Lord George Hamilton Syed Ameer Ali, Sir W. R. Anson, M. P., Mr. L. S. Amery, M. P., Sir Arundel T. Arundel, Sir M. M. Bhowaggee, Sir Stanley Bois, Sir Reginald Brade, Sir Edward Bask, the Rev. Professor Caldecott, General Sir E. F. Chapman, Sir Ernest Clarke, Sir William J. Collins, Sir Homewood Crawford, Professor A. W. Crossley, Sir Louis Dune, Major-General F. J. Davies, Sir Algernon F. Firth, Dr. T. Gregory Foster, Sir W. Garstin, the Rev. Professor Gollancz, Professor Israel Gollancz, Sir Lawrence Gomme, Sir George Grierson, Sir K. G. Gupta, Sir Murray Hamrick, Sir Lancelot Hare, Professor M. J. M. Hill, Sir Walter Hillier, Sir E. H. Holden, Sir Frederick Lely, Mr. G. A. Lloyd, M. P., Professor S. L. Loney, Sir Charles Lyall, Mr. Stanley Machin, Sir Philip Magnus, M. P., Sir Carl Meyer, Sir Henry Miers, Sir Theodore Morison, Mr. Charles Roberts, Under-Secretary for India, the Rev. Dr. J. A. Nairn, Professor J. W. Neill, Professor Prendergast, Sir Walter Pridaux, Sir J. D. Rees, M. P., Sir Frederick Robertson, Sir William Schlich, Sir Felix Schuster, Sir J. George Scott, Sir Amherst Selby-Bigge, Professor F. M. Simpson, Sir J. Dunlop Smith, Sir John Stanley, Sir Richard Stapley, Sir T. Vesey Strong, the hon. C. H. Strutt, Sir F. A. Swettenham, Sir Mark Sykes, M. P., Sir Henry Tanner, Sir James Thomson, Canon Weitbrecht, Sir Harry Wilson, and Mr. P. J. Hartog, Secretary of the Oriental Studies Committee.

The Secretary read a letter from the Earl of Cromer to the Lord Mayor, saying: 'It is with the deepest regret that I find myself prevented by illness from attending and speaking at the meeting which you have been good enough to summon for May 6th in support of the School of Oriental Studies. For the last four years I have had the success of this scheme at heart, and have done my best to surmount the not inconsiderable difficulties which have attended its inception. The only difficulties now remaining are of a financial character, and although I do not underestimate them, I feel that we can confidently appeal to the citizens of London to help us to carry through, within the next few months, a scheme which will be of service to the Metropolis as well as to the Empire. I am convinced that the foundation of the school, which will be at once a training ground for those about to proceed to Africa and the East, and a centre of intelligence in regard to our vast Dominions in those parts, is of vital importance to the continued prosperity of our Oriental commerce and of our Oriental administration. It is a matter in which we can no longer afford to remain in a position of inferiority to other countries.'

The Lord Mayor said the merchant princes of London were thoroughly in sympathy with the establishment of this School of Oriental Studies, and the City was anxious to remove the reproach that while England was the greatest Oriental Power in the world, it possessed no school of Oriental studies that could be compared with those of Paris, Berlin, Vienna, or St. Petersburg. He appealed confidently to the citizens of London to make the projected School a speedy and a great success. (Cheers.)

LORD CURZON'S SPEECH.

Earl Curzon who was received with cheers, moved: 'That in view of the great Imperial and commercial interests dependent on adequate provision being made for instruction in the languages, the literature and the social customs of Oriental and African countries, this meeting desires heartily to support the scheme for the foundation of a school of Oriental Studies in the City of London.' First of all he said he would like to express the gratitude they all felt towards the Lord Mayor and their regret at the absence of Lord Cromer, who had been Chairman of the Committee which had been dealing for four years with the question of the establishment of a School of Oriental Studies a Committee of which the speaker himself was a member. Lord Cromer had attended every meeting of the committee and had done an enormous amount of work in connection with it. In the main that School, when it came into being, would owe its existence to Lord Cromer's influence and untiring perseverance. (Cheers.) Another person whose absence he sincerely regretted was that eminent African administrator Sir Harry Johnston. He would much have liked to see that gentleman there, because this School was intended to deal with the languages and customs not only of the East in the conventional sense of the terms but also of Africa. As the Lord Mayor had pointed out, this was a movement to place Great Britain in the same position with regard to the countries of the East which were administered by us, or with which we had relations of diplomacy or trade, that was occupied by Continental Powers whose interests in the East were far inferior to ours. Germany spent £10,000 a year on a school of Oriental languages at Berlin: France, £8,000 a year on one in Paris: Russia £8,000 a year on one in St. Petersburg to which had lately been added a sister institution at Vladivostok with a similar endowment while even Italy spent £4,000 for a similar purpose. It was hardly credible, having regard to the position of this country in the East, that there should not be an institution of the kind in the British Capital. Our officers and Civil Servants pick up the languages of the countries who went out to the East were left to which they were sent from munshis or interpreters or the native assistants whom they employed, and it was the same with the clerks who were sent to treaty ports and great commercial centres, where our traders were faced with ever-increasing foreign rivalry. Nor was there any machinery for teaching these men what was, from some points of view, ever more important than languages, namely, an acquaintance with the ideas, traditions, customs, and beliefs of Oriental peoples.

LANGUAGE AND SPIRIT.

To know the languages of the East was a great thing, but he ventured to suggest that to know the spirit of the East was a greater. (Hear, hear.) He remembered a phrase that once fell from General Gordon, who said that it was the duty of the Englishmen in the East 'to get inside the skin' of the Oriental with whom he was dealing. That was a very sagacious and pregnant remark. He would not raise the question whether the Eastern man was a different being from the Western man, but undoubtedly there was an atmosphere of the East, and there could be no doubt that the real key to success was a knowledge of the national character of the peoples and their point of view, their religious beliefs, their acrimies, their prejudices, perhaps. (Hear, hear.) To teach such knowledge would, he thought, be an important part of the work of this school of Oriental Studies. During the past quarter of a century more than one effort had been made to remedy the state of things in this country to which he had made reference, but none was successful, and they finally dwindled down to the excellent but rather precarious teaching of a small number of Oriental languages in University College and King's College, London. This state of affairs lasted until, in 1906, an influential deputation went to the then Prime Minister, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and made to him a powerful representation of the case. The Prime Minister gave a most sympathetic reply, and the result was the appointment of a Departmental Committee, presided over by Lord Reay, than whom, among the distinguished Englishmen who had served this country in high administrative offices abroad, none on returning home, had devoted himself with greater enthusiasm to the languages, literature, and interest of the East. (Cheers.) In 1908 Lord Reay's Committee reported, and that report was the basis of all that had happened since. It recommended the institution of a School of Oriental Studies in London, to be ultimately incorporated in the University of London, and to be reasonably endowed by the Government. The next stage was the discussion in the House of Lords in 1909, a discussion inaugurated by his noble friend, Lord Redesdale, who had placed at the service of Lord Reay's committee his unrivalled knowledge of the peoples of the Far East. Lord Cromer and he (Lord Curzon) incautiously took part in that debate, the consequences of which they little foresaw. The then Secretary of State for India, Lord Morley, having adopted a favourable attitude, and indicated a willingness to be further squeezed pounced down on Lord Cromer and himself and told them that they were to formulate and organise a scheme for the establishment of the school, to find a site for the building, sketch out a scheme of managements, and find the necessary fairly ambitious and expensive programme. (Laughter.) Their income. (Laughter.) The meeting would agree that was Committee had sat ever since, and had seen four Lords Mayors and two Permanent Under-Secretaries for Foreign Affairs.

THE LONDON INSTITUTION.

With regard to the site, their attention was directed to the splendid building of the London Institution in the heart of the city, at Finsbury circus, which had a magnificent library, large rooms, and a theatre, and was in a quiet position well adapted to study. With the aid of the chairman of that institution, Lord Aldenham, they succeeded in buying out the interest of the proprietors, the Government promised £20,000 or £25,000 for repairs and alterations, and the building of a new block of class-rooms, and Professor Simpson prepared plans which would be carried out before the middle of the next year. This institution was to be established as a school of the University of London, but under a Royal Charter. The bodies represented among the Governors would be the University of London, several provincial Universities, the Foreign Office, the War Office, the India Office, the Corporation of the City of London, the London County Council, the Royal Asiatic Society, the British Academy, and the London Chamber of Commerce. In the school would be taught nine Indian languages, as well as Arabic, Persian, Malay, Chinese, Japanese, Hansa, and Swahili. There were to be six professors and a number of assistants. The King had honoured them by consenting to be patron of the institution. (Cheers.) The Committee estimated the annual expenditure at £14,000, and towards this the Government had promised £4,000, and the Government of India £1,250. They had hopes that the London County Council would make them a handsome grant. In fact, the Education Committee of the Council had, he believed, recommended a grant of £2,000 a year. (Cheers.)

With regard to the city, he appealed to the Lord Mayor to be kind enough to use his powerful influence with the splendid and munificent body over which he presided. (Cheers.) The school would be valuable to the commerce of the city, and once it was established the present Lord Mayor's successors would claim it, and rightly claim it, as a city institution. (Cheers.) He greatly hoped that they might be assisted, too, by those admirable bodies the City Companies, whom everybody co-operated in bleeding, and who revelled in the surgical operation. (Laughter.) Some he believed were favourably inclined but on this subject they must adopt a formula which was popular in high politics; they must wait and see. (Laughter.) He hoped that the formula of the Companies would be: hurry up and pay. (Laughter.) The Committee desired to raise an endowment fund. It behoved the merchants of the city who traded with the East to support the scheme if they did not want to see the plums from the cake and the spoils of commercial enterprise taken by their indigestible foreign rivals, particularly the Germans, as was being done at the present time. He appealed for recognition for what was really a great Imperial obligation. It was part of the necessary furniture of Empire. There was a gap in our national equipment which ought to be filled, and those who took part in filling it would be rendering a patriotic duty to the Empire and promoting the cause of peace and good will among mankind.

'DON'T'S' FOR ANGLO-INDIANS.

Lord Reay, in seconding the resolution, emphasised the importance of understanding the manners and customs of the peoples of the East. There were certain things that an Englishman in India for instance, ought to know, such as that he should not call on a Hindu at prayer time, morning, noon, or night, that he should not cast a shadow on any food a Brahmin was eating, and that he should not interfere with a workman at work.

THE RESOLUTION WAS CARRIED.

Lord Inchcape proposed, and Mr. F. Faithful Begg seconded, a resolution appealing to the commercial community of the city and the general public for funds to enable the school to be opened in 1915 on a satisfactory financial basis. This also was adopted.

The Marquess of Crewe proposed a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor. In doing so, he referred to the close connection between the City of London and East ever since the foundation of the first of the East Indian Companies rather more than 300 years ago. Indians were studying the English language and English literature more and more every day, and that being so there was a reciprocal obligation on Englishmen who went out to India to learn not merely the languages of India, but Indian customs and Indian history. He trusted that all those connected with the City of London would take a prominent and noble part in supplying the needs of this School of Oriental Studies and he was certain that countless as were the objects which had been promoted and pressed forward in the Mansion House, that nursery of good causes, there were not many more worthy of general support than the cause they had met to advocate that day. (Cheers.)

On Toleration and the Turk.

THERE is nothing that so surely enshrines the past in a living balm of piety as a monastery. It is in the critical spirit that the true monk locks his door. His treasure is a thing of chance. No connoisseur has gathered or preserved it. It is always the gift of hazard that some random affection or antique habit has made precious. Here it is a priceless manuscript that a carved chest contains, there a chased salver, and again some pitiful relic that survives only to commemorate credulity and superstition. We recall a curious monastic treasure which in itself summed up a whole world of ambiguous yet beautiful sentiment. It lies in the monastery of Rilo on the frontiers of the old Bulgaria. There is much that is curious and beautiful around it. The mountains have made for it a narrow hermit's cell with their towering walls of greenery, their spires of living rock, their rippling streams that are a ceaseless call to prayer. The whitewashed masonry with its reminiscences, now of the Venetian and again of Byzantine architecture, are solid tomes of history. Like the memories of the monks, it is a chronicle of revolt and brigandage, of plotting and massacre. The treasure is that rarest of all relics, a memento of tolerance, the gift of a fraternity which could overstep race and creed. It is a great candle, such as men of all religions have loved to burn at their altars, presented to this Christian monastery by one of the more glorious Sultans of the House of Othman. Nor is its message inarticulate. Among the treasured manuscripts of the place is a letter in which this tolerant Turk assured the monks of Rilo of his regard and protection, and bade them pray for him at the altar to which he sent his gift. Rilo in the centuries to come was to be the centre of many a savage struggle between Christians and Turks. Here the bands were sheltered and armed which set out with fire and sword for the liberation of Macedonia. Hither the refugees fled with their tales of horror, from its devastated villages, when revolution had brought in its train the usual reprisals of alarmed authority. Crusade provoked jihad, and outrage was answered by massacre, but still, amid the angers and fanaticisms, these candles stood in Rilo to recall the good deed of the tolerant Sultan. There was nothing insincere in their tolerance nor has time made it obsolete. The Turks were and are a tolerant people.

It is a book in defence of the Turks, not too accurate in its facts, and far from tactful in its polemics, which has reminded us of Rilo. In "Turkish Memories" (Heinemann), Mr. Sidney Whitman is concerned largely with Abdul Hamid and the Armenian massacres. He is a partial historian, and his competence to write on Eastern affairs may be judged from the fact that he supposes the Armenians to belong to the Greek Orthodox Church (p. 20). But the book, superficial and but moderately interesting as it is, makes one point which is worth considering. Mr. Whitman, travelling through Armenia to investigate the atrocities as a personal friend of Abdul Hamid, with Palace officers at his side, and Kurdish cavalry for his guard of honor, was impressed by the fact that everywhere on the hillsides of this country which Turkish fanaticism was supposed to have devastated, he saw churches and monasteries of the Armenians, inviolate, flourishing, and secure. On that impression fortified by similar evidence, he bases the conclusion that the persecutions and massacres of the Armenians were in no sense religious, that fanaticism played no part in them, and that they were a purely political reprisal for the outrages and seditious propaganda of Armenian revolutionists.

The thesis is not new. It is, indeed, the usual Turkish version of these ghastly events, but Mr. Whitman puts it forward with an uncritical assurance unusual among disinterested Europeans. The Turkish mind is essentially loyal and honest, and when it is driven into untruth, it lies clumsily and badly. This excuse is not oldsway, and it is not a lie. It is in our experience, so far as it goes, the exact truth, and it fails to be a fair account of this hideous social phenomenon not because of what it states, but because of what it omits. The persecution of Christians by Turks never was religious, as the persecution of Jews by Christians or of heretics by the Church was religious. It was not inspired by hatred of their "errors," by anger at their rejection of sacred teaching, by a desire to vindicate the authority of a Church, nor by a wish to save souls in the next world by destroying bodies in this life. Islam, in short, has never earned Gibbon's censure on the early Church; it has never defended absurdities by cruelties. There have, indeed, been cases, even in recent centuries, of forced conversions en masse by the sword, but these were always an incident of warfare, and did not occur among populations which quietly accepted Ottoman rule. We so far agree with Mr. Whitman as to believe that if there had been no Bulgarian insurrection there would have been no Bulgarian horrors, and if there had been no Armenian secret societies there would have been no Armenian massacres.

Had the Christians of the Ottoman Empire remained deaf to nationalist aspirations, and turned a cold shoulder to fraternal incitements from outside, they might have vegetated in a relative security as tolerable as that which the Jews of Salonica and Smyrna have enjoyed since they formed under the Crescent an asylum from the Inquisition. Whatever else may be said of Turkish atrocities and massacres, they are not religious phenomena comparable with the destruction of the Albigenses, the St. Bartholomew massacres, or the exploits of the Holy Office. When the Turks persecuted, they were not vindicating dogma; they were securing the outworks of an empire based upon conquest.

The distinction may seem subtle. After all, it will be justly said, Armenians and Bulgarians were exposed to the intermittent sufferings and humiliations which provoked insurrection only because they were Christians, and any time they might have escaped all danger by becoming Moslems. That is the broad fact which Mr. Whitman's casuistry ignores. Life was made intolerable for progressive and self-respecting Christians, with the result that some of them rebelled, whereupon rebellion was suppressed with massacre. History in such cases may have some censure for the imprudence of the rebels, but it holds the conqueror and oppressor responsible for the whole chain of evils. The distinction which Mr. Whitman and his school invite us to make is interesting only in the world of theory and psychology, but there it is vital.

The simple fact is that toleration, though we continue to use the word loosely, has long since ceased to be the ideal of civilized men. It represented in European history a half-way house, and a middle term between persecution and full civil equality. It was toleration which kept the Irish Catholics as helots under the penal laws, and debarred them from the ownership of land and the exercise of professions, while it allowed them the practice of their rites. It was toleration which excluded the Jews from the franchise, while it protected their synagogues and stamped out the medieval instinct for pogroms. It was not toleration, but a Liberal theory of the secular State which opened wide the doors of political and civil rights to Catholics, Non-conformists, and Jews. The interesting fact about the Turks, or rather about Islam in general, is that it was the first and greatest builder of this half-way house. It is not enough to say that Islam is tolerant; it is based on tolerance, it has been the standard-bearer and model of tolerance among the world's civilizations. Its theory and practice had as a corner-stone the permissive existence of tolerated cults, which were not merely allowed but protected. So far from making any effort under moral conditions of peace to convert Christians or Jews, the Moslem ruling class regarded them as permanent castes, designed to persevere in their errors under an inscrutable destiny, as pariahs are destined to persevere in their uncleanness. Their rights were well-defined and rarely infringed. They were governed by their own ecclesiastical heads, who administered the civil as well as the canon law in their internal affairs. They enjoyed the public exercise of their cults and were absolutely free in matters of opinion.

The apologist of Islam is entitled to make the most of the wisdom and humanity which inspired this institution. The Prophet anticipated John Locke by a round thousand years, and the history of Islam is in consequence a luminous and glorious page in the matter of tolerance, when one places it side by side with the records of Christian doctors and princes from St. Augustine downwards. But toleration in the strict sense of the word is an attitude of contempt. The tolerated sects of Christians and Jews occupied a status midway between slavery and freedom. The early statesmen and jurists of Islam defined it sharply, and practice rather tended to worsen than to better the plight of the rayahs. They were in theory an enemy who had made an external submission. They had bought off the worst penalty of conquest by consenting to pay a tribute. They were a subject caste with rights that marked their status of inferiority. They might own slaves, but not Moslem slaves. They might not marry Moslem women. They might not own or bear arms. There was a penalty on a Moslem who killed one of them, but it was never death, and was always less than the blood-price of a true believer. Their evidence, like that of a slave could not be accepted in court. They might ride mules but not horses. They might retain their churches but could not build new ones, nor even repair their ancient fanes. This was the theory of Islam as its greatest doctors defined it. Its practice as the Bulgarian and the Armenian knew it, was governed mainly by the fact that the Turk was usually his landlord, and that the Kurd and Albanian alone went armed. Toleration bore the same fruits in Catholic Ireland and in Christian Armenia, aggravated, indeed, in the latter by the redness of the ruling race and the feebleness of the central government. By all means let us give the Turk his due, but let us make no fetish of tolerance. If persecution has slain its thousands, tolerance has degraded its hundreds. The monks did well to keep the Sultan's candles in the library at Riloi. But who shall say that they did ill to store rifles in the cellar?—The Nation.

TRAFFICKING IN ABUSE.

THERE is only one thing more apparent than the monotonous scurrility of the Tory Press when dealing with Liberal Ministers and Liberal measures, and that is its utter ineffectiveness. The disadvantage of always screaming when you talk is that when you do want to raise your voice you cannot. If the epithets 'rogue,' 'liar,' 'traitor,' 'bully,' are used daily about opponents they not only cease to convey any stigma, but are dead when applied on some serious occasion. It is this fact which so troubles the Tory writers. Having exhausted the vocabulary of abuse in their ordinary vocabulary of Liberalism they have nothing left for 'a rainy day,' and, hoarse with bawling, can only repeat their hackneyed catalogue, complaining 'that current language' is unable 'to keep pace with current events to quote the Pall Mall Gazette.

A few citations from Tory journals will show how great a hold the new style has got. I unhesitatingly affirm that it is impossible to find in Liberal organs of similar standing to these papers such an utter disregard not only of the elementary decencies of controversy but of the elementary meaning of words. The quotations I have taken are from the Tory Press of last month and in order to avoid the charge of exaggeration the passages selected do not represent the Tory Press at its worst, they are fair samples of its medium mood:—

'We learn on authority, which we cannot question, that warrants have already been signed for the arrest of leaders of the Ulster movement.'—Globe, March 19.

Though this statement was untrue, the Globe did not, so far as we can discover, withdraw it.

'We believe the Unionist party will now refuse to have any further truck with a Cabinet of tricketers and 'agents provocateurs.'—Globe, March 23.

'General' Lloyd George, the debased Maconchi Minister, and now official incendiary, will work his vile ways in vain.'—Globe, March 23.

'The honour of Ministers is worth £8 a week. There is no dirt, no filth that Ministers will not eat if only they can cling to office a little longer.'—Globe, March 27.

'Trickery evasion, and downright falsehood have stained with indelible dishonour the actions of this unprecedented Government.'—Globe, March 26.

THE 'TIMES' AND MINISTERS.

The Times, though not so blunt as the Globe is equally insulting. It refers to Mr. Churchill as Mr. Lloyd George's 'rival in vituperation,' speaks of the reckoning to be sought with the plotters who planned the forcible coercion of Ulster, and asks 'need we take any further notice of the evasions and the protestations of Mr. Churchill and other plotters?' On March 27 the Times declared that—

'The cynical withdrawal of these pledges has induced a widespread feeling that no undertaking by this Government, however solemn, no promise, however sacred, will be kept for an instant longer than political exigencies require.'

During the month of March the forthcoming reduction of the Times to 1d. rivalled in importance the Ulster crisis in the columns of the Daily Mail but there was room for such headlines as 'The Bullies,' 'Dirty work for the Army,' and for the prophecy that the Government are coming, and not honest, would be the verdict of the British People. Mr. Asquith, said the Daily Mail, must be beginning to see 'he cannot carry out his fraudulent bargain with Mr. Redmond.' The Daily Express, however, atoned for any excess of 'sweetness and light in the Daily Mail.' Included in its headlines were:

Up to the neck.

Still on the knee.

As for the limpets who cling to office and salary in this incredible fashion, they are beyond the piercing touch of shame. First the "hellish" plot to make a pogrom in Ulster, now amply proved, in spite of Sir John Simon, by evidence against which Mr. Asquith's verbal assurances do not weigh at all. Then the offer of a choice to the officers who were to carry out the pogrom. Then the resignation. Then the Ministerial lies and extra lies morasses of lying which are given a new twist with each new hour, with the dishonoured cheque lying on top of all.—Daily Express, March 28.

'The Ulster pogrom and its sequels are made the excuse for a "star turn" by Mr. Asquith, P. M. of England, in his new character of profession of droll.'—Daily Express, March 31.

SHRIEKING HEADLINES.

'P. M. of England' is quite good and to the Daily Express belongs the further distinction of discovering the hair-raising qualities of 'pogrom,' the 'P. M. of Russia', but the 'honours' undoubtedly belong to the Pall Mall Gazette. 'Bully,' 'Juggler,' 'pantaloner,' 'slanderous,' 'indecent,' 'put-up job,' 'vile means,' 'clutching at dirty handholds,' were among its happiest hits. The headlines were worthy of a paper which, as has been wittily remarked, is not so much published as carried shrieking into the street. Here are three examples:—

What the Government Intended,

Days of Butchery.

The letterpress was in the same strain:—

The plot that failed becomes the more scandalous, the more the details are known. It was worthy of a Negro republic. There is no doubt even in well informed circles that the work of exasperating Ulster was deliberately contemplated'. Pall Mall Gazette, March 24.

The faction that supports the conspirators is prepared to go to any lengths of destruction in its spleen and rage. A Ministry shamed and convicted growing in malignancy as it declines in power.—Pall Mall Gazette, March 25.

'The length of a barge pole will not bottom the muddiness of the plot and the second plot...Ministers eat a very dirt to save face'—Pall Mall Gazette March 26.

Mr. Asquith's acceptance of the post of Secretary for War and the consequent by-election were described in the Pall Mall Gazette headlines as a

Premier as 'Poor Reynard'

'The House of Commons had become 'too hot' for the Prime Minister, and he was snatching a brief holiday from humiliation, leaving his Ministers to stew in their own juice. The same journal stated that the Government could not afford 'the luxuries of consistency and honour,' and was 'without a rag of respect to drape the position to which they still cling with paralytic clutches.' Why one should 'drape a position' with a rag is not clear.

THE NON-PARTY ORGAN.

'It may be well said that the conditions of English politics are fast approximating to those of Mexico.—Morning Post, March 26.

Then Morning Post is not in the counsels of my party...it is an independent organ free from any party or trust, political or financial.... We leave concealment of Liberal Whips, lies to Liberal Ministers, and misrepresentations to the Liberal Press.—Morning Post, March 28.

'Every vote for a Liberal is a vote for civil war.—Morning Post, March 28.

The Standard, whilst not professing to be 'free from any party,' is content with referring to the Government as 'a group of political adventurers who are showing themselves as inept as they are unscrupulous.'

These pledge bound Ministers who have sworn on oath to commit the foulest treason against democracy that a Government ever conceived are entangled in the nets of their own making, and are willing to bring to ruin the whole fabric of the State in a last desperate effort to break through.—Daily Telegraph, March 30.

We have not referred to the provincial Tory Press. A single quotation will show how the example of the London Tory Press is emulated. The Yorkshire Freeman's Post, alluding to the sore throat from which Mr. Lloyd George is suffering, said:

'We trust his ailment will keep him just sufficiently indisposed to be unable to return to the House of Commons before Mr. Asquith.

Later it contemplates the advantages which might accrue—

'If demagogues can be conveniently silenced for a time, whether by the operation of sore throats or some other merciful intervention of Nature.

To conclude, here are a few flowers of speech culled at random from the pages of the current issue of the National Review the acknowledged organ of the 'Die-hard' section of the Tory party.

'We are governed by a combination of black mailers and blackmailed.

'There are no limits to the amount of dirt which an Asquith can eat.'

'The present Prime Minister believes in nothing, not even in himself.'

'Sir Edward Grey would cheerfully smash up the Army and cashier every officer, provided his party secured a few votes. It is high time that a sanctimonious impostor who has enjoyed the privileges of a chartered libertine should be unmasked.'

'It is said of George Washington that he never told a lie, and it can be said of Mr. Lloyd George that he rarely tells the truth.'

'Even such utterly discredited demagogues as the Windbag and the Artful Dodger continue to collect audiences at Bradford and Huddersfield.'

'All the contemptibleness of Mr. Asquith's shifty character was revealed by his answer.'

'Not a statement of his (Mr. Lloyd George's) should be accepted except upon affidavit, and even then it should be handled with tongs.'

'Mentiris impudentissime (O most abandoned liar)—for the first time in history that stinging phrase, which should cut a man of honour like a whip can be addressed with justice to a British Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that British Chancellor of the Exchequer does not care.'

'That is the bitterest reflection of all—to the beaten and discredited 'Die-hard'—Mr. Lloyd George 'does not care'.—Daily Chronicle.

Mr. Wells on Rebels.

MR. H. G. WELLS tells the Daily Herald why he prefers a constructive person to a rebel.

"It is possible to make rebellion a cant," said Mr. Wells. "I think the Daily Herald comes near to making rebellion a cant. I disagree with the paper's little way of calling people rebels as if it were praise, as if rebellion was a permanent profession, and highly honourable. Rebellion is sometimes a disagreeable necessity. I admit that. I admit that there are things one cannot stand, one must be quite of them, one has to liberate one's soul from them at any cost. But this note of pride! No.

"A rebel is a nuisance. A rebel is always a bit of lout. Any fool can do rebels' works, and smash and spoil. Don't we all remember from our school days the sort of little beast who used to 'stash up' games? When one has to rebel when there is no more decent or human method, then rebel and have done with it. But to flourish about it as though it was something gaudy and glorious is to show an imbecile's outlook on life. Life is to be and do and make and cherish, not to spoil, insult, defy and embitter. If you must rebel, be clean and direct about it. Decide upon the things you won't stand and don't stand them. If there are things that hamper your life, get rid of them. But get rid of them as quietly and decently as you can.

"Don't spoil life for other people. Don't regard your insurmountable objection to this or that oppression as the heroic justification for any malicious mischief that the ancestral monkey, still lurking in our composition, puts into your head. Everybody has an occasional craving for spiteful destruction. I restrain myself here from a tedious story about a greenhouse and an impulse in my boyhood.) Even in Florence they once smashed ornaments and burnt books and pictures with the utmost gusto. It is one of our ugly factors. It has to be restrained just as we have to restrain many people from a certain innate filthiness, just as we have to restrain many dogs from fighting and many men from a disposition to pursue and frighten unprotected girls in lonely places. It is atavism. It is not the last divine birth of the human spirit.

THE LORD OF THE FUTURE.

"Isn't there a principle actor in the great drama of the modern state whom the Daily Herald ignores?" queries Mr. Wells. "I perceive all about me, and I perceive also in myself and my own life, both of the two opponents in the Daily Herald's social picture, both Fat Man and the lean, large-limbed, small-headed, pathetic Worker. Neither strikes me as the hopeful lord of the future. Even if the Fat Man be slain, cut up, melted in vats for his tallow, I do not see a very hopeful heir in his toiling, untutored, microcephalic antagonist.

"Isn't there, indeed, between these two, something as yet inadequate in which the hope of man resides, something that is neither pride and greed on the one hand nor blind anger and revolt on the other—Intelligence and Will? Has the Daily Herald no sense of Thought and Science and Education as the true heirs of the future that will put an end to Serfs and Fat Men and—Kings? In schools and laboratories to-day there are heroes at work. Or does the Good Rebel hope also to burn the books and smash the experiments, and leave nothing finer than a Rebel Leader in the world?"

THE HONEST PARTY.

The word "rebel" displeases even Mr. G. K. Chesterton, for in the same paper he says:—

"The word 'rebel' understates our cause. It is much too mild; it lets our enemies off much too easily.

"I should not say to Mr. Rockefeller 'I am a rebel.' I should say 'I am a respectable man; and you are not.'

"We want a term that will tell everybody that there is, by the common standard, frank fraud and cruelty pushed to their fierce extreme; and that we are fighting them. We are not in a state of 'divine discontent'; we are in an entirely human and entirely reasonable rage. I cannot at the moment think of any party name that would particularly distinguish us from our more powerful and prosperous opponents, unless it were the name the old Jacobites gave themselves; the Honest party."

Supplement to the Comrade, 6th June, 1914.

[We regret that through an oversight the leading article on "The Press Act and Proselytization" in our last issue was published without the proofs having been read. We extremely regret it and republish it to-day as a Supplement.]

The Press Act and Proselytization.

In the course of the now famous judgment of the Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins in our Pamphlet Case his lordship had said: "I recognise the force of the argument that the Act (the Press Act) 'is now being applied to a purpose never intended'". But Sir Lawrence perhaps forgot that intentions, like everything else in a hot climate, expand enormously. Although the Hon. the Home Member was the author of the new Contempt of Court Bill, and was, therefore, extremely careful of the respect due to a judgment of three of the seniormost Judges of the Calcutta High Court, he nevertheless pointed out to the learned Chief Justice that he had misinterpreted Government's intentions in passing the Press Bill of one of his predecessors into law. But unless the Hon. Member accepts our theory of expansion in relation to intentions, he would find it difficult to justify the application of the Press Act to the two religious papers of the Mussalmans in the Punjab, the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr.

Last year the "Nawal Kishore Press" of Lahore published three small volumes of a book or tract in Urdu entitled Ibat-i-Kaffara (Proof of Atonement). Its author was Rev. Thomas Howell Bashir, Pastor of a Church belonging to the Christian sect of the Church of England. On the cover it is indicated that the publication was a rejoinder to objections raised against the Christian doctrine of Atonement. The preface makes this still more clear and we learn therein that a Mufti Sadiq Saheb, who was a Christian for a time, once more became a Mussalman, and as such delivered a lecture on the doctrine of Atonement when Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din took the chair. The author says that he had asked the Khwaja Saheb's permission to question the lecturer at the end of the lecture which was withheld "on account of the obstinacy 'and bigotry of members of the Ahmadi sect,' and he was thus prevented from making a rejoinder then and there. Sometime after this the Mufti who had lectured published a book called Kaffara (Atonement). The three volumes of Rev. Howell's book, Ibat-i-Kaffara, are, we are here informed, a rejoinder to the lecture and the book of Mufti Sadiq Saheb.

As regards the Christian doctrine of Atonement, we need say nothing as it is too well known, and we do not think any one would accuse us of injustice to Rev. Howell if we said that it is rather difficult now for anyone to discover a new argument to prove this doctrine. But the way in which the old arguments can be presented are innumerable, and whatever merit Rev. Howell could claim could only lie in his presentation of the case. We have no desire to set up as a controversialist, or even a judge of such polemics, but we cannot refrain from saying that Mr. Howell's methods are certainly not Christ-like, even if they are Christian. We do not know how Christianity is benefited by referring to the Prophet of Islam as having in his heart "the seed of sin which is called the Devil's part", which was repeatedly taken out by the Archangel Gabriel and equally repeatedly grew again. Is the doctrine of Atonement likely to be proved to the satisfaction of a rationalist by saying that Mohamed "frequently remained in subjection to Satan and sorcery"? What relevancy has the following in a discussion about that Christian doctrine:—"Notwithstanding Gabriel's endeavours to remove it by repeated washings, the blackness of (Mohamed's) heart, which was the seed or spermatozoon of 'sin or the Devil's part, could not be removed: or perhaps Mohamed 'used to blacken his heart by not guarding it and repeatedly committing sins.' Or take this as a sample of the Reverend gentleman's style of argument: "Mohamed was caught in the vapour of 'Hell'. . . In the battle of Uhud Mohamed had a tooth 'knocked off besides receiving other wounds. All this was visited upon 'Mohamed on account of his sins with which he was loaded till his 'death'. Turning from the Prophet to his faith and to his followers we get the following:—"The Mussalmans and their divines who committed the crimes of adultery and theft, did so according to the 'desire of Mohamed and behind the screen of 'There is no god 'but God' (the first part of the Moslem formula of faith). . . Through 'this (Islamic) teaching, not only did the number of Moslem prostitutes increase in this world, but Paradise also was filled with hoars and ghilman and became a quarter full of brothels." Take another sample: "It is the Mohamedan formula of faith which not only encourages a sinner to sin, but is also acting as a digestive pill to assist him in the digestion of sins. And encouraging people to sin beyond measure (sic), in practice, thanks to the Mohamedan formula of 'faith, not only are the brothels and the bazars of the towns filled 'with Moslem women who repeat the formula of the faith, but the 'gaols have also been filled'".

It has been said that there is never a controversy about religion but religion is thereby a loser. For our part, we cannot ignore the necessity of religious controversies, and missionary religions cannot avoid them. But the history of the preaching of Islam offers unshakeable evidence for the belief that the example of lives well lived and the few words whispered earnestly at moments when the soul expands and yearns for truth and communion with another soul, are far more effective in winning true converts than all the religious controversies in the world. Possibly Rev. Thomas Howell's scheme of conversion is quite different and he relies upon vituperation of this kind for giving him the converts he seeks. Obviously it does not matter to him a bit whether his proselytising methods wound the religious feelings of the Mussalmans or not. But it is too much to expect that the people whose religious feelings are wounded would remain wholly indifferent to Rev. Howell's vituperation. "Tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye" supplies an obvious method of securing satisfaction; but the infuriated Mussalman is to a great extent denied this opportunity of easing his feelings. The Christian theologian can denounce the Quran as a fabrication and a fraud; but the Mussalman, although he may allege interpolations in the Biblical text, is prevented by his own religious belief from denying the divine origin of the Christian Scriptures. Similarly, a Christian may call the Prophet of Islam an imposter and an evil person; but a Mussalman's religion imposes upon him respect for the personality and character of Jesus Christ as a Messenger of God. Obviously, therefore, if a Moslem theologian, no matter how incensed, offers a reply to Christian abuse of the Moslem Scriptures and the Moslem Prophet, he can only denounce certain Christian doctrines, which he regards as the creation of later glossators of the Bible, and Jesus Christ's claim to divinity, put forward not by him but by a large majority of his followers. It is only within these limits that Christ or Christianity can be criticised by Mussalmans. This must be clearly understood, for on this hang the cases of the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr, both of which wrote their peccant articles as rejoinders to Rev. Howell's book on Atonement.

I. THE CASE OF THE "AHL-I-HADEES."

To take the case of the Ahl-i-Hadees. This paper, which is an important religious organ of the Moslem sect of "the People of the Tradition," understood the Christian doctrine of Atonement to be as follows:--

Our Christian friends believe that sin is divided into two kinds—original sin and sin against the law. They define original sin in this way: Because man is the son of Adam, who committed sin, every Son of Adam is sinful by origin. And the sin against law they define thus: that disobedience to Divine law is sin. By these two suppositious definitions they conclude that Jesus was not the Son of Adam because he was born only of woman, and that, consequently, he was the Son of God. Moreover, as he did nothing against the law, he was sinless, and can, therefore, atone for the sins of all mankind.

The Ahl-i-Hadees had attacked the first part of the Christian argument in a previous article on "Jesus of the Gospels" in which it had sought to prove from the Christian Scriptures themselves that Jesus Christ was the offspring of the union of a man and a woman, and can, therefore, be no more devoid of "original sin" according to the Christian doctrine than any other person born of such union. In the article which drew upon it the wrath of the Punjab Government not a word is said even remotely suggesting that the writer believes Christ to be a sinner, and all that he has permitted himself to do with reference to the first part of the argument is to quote these three texts from the Bible:

I know it is so of a truth: but how shall man be just with God?—Job ix, 2.

For there is not a just man upon earth, that doth good and sinneth not.—Ecclesiastes vii, 20.

If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.—I John i, 8.

We are not here concerned with the merits of the controversy; but can any one say that the method of controversy adopted by the Ahl-i-Hadees is not in glaring contrast with that chosen by the Christian Pastor? It is not for a Mussalman to abuse Jesus Christ, but he can argue that those who infer from the circumstances of his birth his freedom from sin, and from that the doctrine of Atonement, do so by ignoring passages contradicting these claims which the Bible itself contains. This is indicated by the title of the article itself:

"Atonement in the Bible: Was Jesus of the Gospels Sinless?"
(The italics are ours.) The writer then goes on :

If, for the sake of argument, we suppose that he was born without father, that in no way proves the point of our Christian brethren, because it is written in Job xiv. 4: "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one;" xv. 14: "What is man that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman that he should be righteous?"

The writer also argues that "woman is more sinful than man, because she did not sin herself alone, but induced Adam to sin," and once more quotes the Bible: "And Adam was not deceived but the woman being deceived was in the transgression." (I Timothy ii. 14.)

So much for the argument about "original sin," and what is there here which is "calculated to bring into contempt the Christian population of the Province," as the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab thinks, or "wantonly scurrilous and offensive," as the Secretary of State is compelled to describe?

Let us now see whether the writer in the Ahl-i-Hadees has done anything more reprehensible in dealing with Christ's sinfulness or sinlessness according to the law. Once more we must bear in mind that the writer is not dealing with Jesus as the Mussalmans know and venerate, but with "the Jesus of the Gospels". What he does is to quote texts from the gospels, and, whether one agrees with his interpretation or not, it cannot be denied that the texts can be interpreted in a manner in which they do not do justice to so great and holy a personality. The well-known text in Mathews: "I come not to send peace but a sword" etc., can easily bear an interpretation wholly different from that which Christians accept, and we have no doubt that if an Indian patriot used such expressions to-day the police would have something to say to him, and the authorities of our colleges would certainly hold up the man who boasted that he had come "to set a man against his father" to public opprobrium—in the interests of discipline! Take again Christ's abuse of the Pharisees and Scribes as "an evil and adulterous generation" and a "generation of vipers". We know what the Pharisees and the Scribes were like in the days of Christ; but have we no Pharisees and Scribes among us who can count on the support of officialdom when "young hot-heads" call them by names not half as abusive? Again, Christ accused the Prophets who had preceded him of being "thieves and robbers". The writer quotes other passages and offers a running criticism of unequal merit, and finally cites Mathew xix, 17: "And he said unto him, Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one—that is God".

So much for "Jesus of the Gospels". But what of Jesus as the writer believes him to be? Does he, too, consider him to be a disturber of peace and a man given to unseemly abuse of others, an ungrateful son and a brother without affection, the author of vain prophecies and a teacher of dissembling, fond of loving women who were not related to him, and of wine drinking as, in his opinion, the texts cited by him suggest? Let us give the reply in his own words. He concludes the pertinent article with the following:—"In short, according to the decision of the Old and the New Testaments Jesus was sinful by 'origin' and according to law. If he was 'sinful he cannot atone for the sins of others, according to the Christian teachings. So Jesus can in no way carry away the sins of all Christians. Christian friends, give up this unbecoming and fanciful 'idea of Atonement and believe in the Holy Book which in a few but portentous words calls Jesus son of Mary ilhamious in this world and the world to come'" to the sins of which he bore the load throughout his life, and for which he was caught in the vapours of Hell. But it at once becomes alive to the far-reaching results of the imputation—and that too pointed out merely to prove the absurdity of such inferences from the Bible itself—that Jesus died young and was crucified because he was rude to "the mother who kept awake for nights "that he might sleep, who many a time went without meals "that he might eat and bore trouble that he might rest in comfort." Does not the Bible say: "Honour thy father and mother that thy days may be long," and does not Mathew tell us that "Jesus said unto her, Woman, what have I to do with you?" Is not the argument at least as good as that which accounted for the loss of a tooth by Mohamed in the battle of Uhud? It is true that perhaps neither one nor the other would give the rival missionaries a single convert. But is Sir Michael O'Dwyer so little occupied with the ordinary duties of administration that he must teach missionaries how to convert as well as teach journalists how to conduct newspapers in his vast leisure? Again, even the prestige of Piccadilly has to be maintained at the cost of ten thousand rupees in cash and a large printing press to a writer of piquant prose. But is not the honour of their women at least as dear to the Mussalmans of the Punjab, and has no law yet been framed and enacted to deal with a foul-mouthed "trafficker in souls" who ascribes the overcrowding of Punjab brothels and bazars to the Moslem women's belief in the formula: "There is no god but God and Mohamed is His Prophet"? The Zamindar shall not even publish the statistics of divorces in England, because that would bring the purest Anglo-Indian maid and matron into contempt. But Rev. Thomas Howell Bashir, Pastor of the Church of England, could not possibly bring the Mussalmans into greater contempt than the world already feels for them by reason of their yearning for a Heaven of lechery and worse.

And this, if you please, is "calculated to bring into contempt the Christian population of the Province". This, of all things, is "wantonly scurrilous and offensive"! If the Christian population of the Province is ever brought into contempt, it would be brought into contempt by their unchristian conduct rather than by their belief even in the doctrine of Atonement. But is there no Moslem population in the Punjab, and did it never occur to the highly sensitive Government of the Punjab that it could be brought into contempt by being alleged to be the followers of one whose black heart could not be cleansed even by the repeated washings of an Archangel? The Panjab Government has, to our knowledge, taken no notice of the Christian Pastor of the Church of England who attributed the loss of a tooth by the Prophet of Islam and other injuries sustained in the battle of Uhud

This is no new case, for we have had all the documents concerned with us for a full six months. But we awaited the result of the appeals of the Ahl-i-Hadees to Sir Michael O'Dwyer, and, in the last resort, the reply of the Secretary of State to a question in Parliament. Both are now before us and they need more than a little comment. To the prayer of the publisher of the paper, the well-known Maulvi Sananullah of Amritsar, the Government of the Punjab deigned to reply after three months of deliberation and cogitation that Sir Michael O'Dwyer saw no reason to reconsider his orders regarding the security. Once more he petitioned His Honour to reconsider his decision and pointed out that in his case it was not only he who was required to deposit a security of Rs 2,000, as a publisher, but that the keeper of the Press also where the Ahl-i-Hadees is printed had been required to deposit Rs 1,000, which amount, too, the publisher has had to provide. This, as he states, is against the practice of the Punjab Government; but evidently His Honour does not believe in the doubtful virtue of consistency, and after another month's deliberation and cogitation he expressed his regret that he cannot accept the publisher's representation.

That, however, is nothing. The paper has furnished the "good conduct" money and may lose it any day so long as the Press Act remains on the Statute Book in its present form. But the reply of the Under-Secretary of State to Mr. Morrell adds insult to injury. "The Secretary of State has read the articles and can only describe them as wantonly scurrilous and offensive." What shall one say to this but that he can only describe the reply as an unmitigated misstatement. We know our England and our Englishmen with their wonderful equipment for learning Oriental languages and their still more wonderful linguistic aptitude. And we know our Secretary of State also. He is as incapable of reading the articles in question as the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab of writing them. What he has probably read is the English composition of a Secretariat hireling who can translate :

as "(O, destroyer of the garden root and branch," and who can summarise a long and learned thesis on the possibility of Virgin Mary being a hermaphrodite in a few words as filthy and disgusting as the wretch himself. And that is how India is to be ruled by the "man on the spot" and retained "on the floor of the House of Commons"!

of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only 13s. 4d.. Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

The Week.

Albania.

London, June 4.

Reuter learns that Great Britain and Germany have expressed their readiness to send warship to Durazzo if the other Powers do likewise in the event of danger to peace.

Durazzo, June 6.

It is reported that the Albanian Government has accepted the demands of the Epirotes.

Durazzo, June 7.

The Italian Colonel Muriocchio and Italian Professor Chinigo have been arrested at the house of the Italian postmaster and charged with exchanging flashlight signals with the insurgents. The Italian Consulate has protested against the violation of domicile and both have been released.—Reuter.

Vienna, June 7.

When Signori Muriocchio and Chinigo were arrested many compromising documents were found. The Dutch Commander Thomson at first refused the demand for release, but eventually liberated the men on parole on the recommendation of the Prince.—Reuter.

Rome, June 7.

A Message from Durazzo says that the Ex-Premier of Albania, Turkhan Pasha, called at the Italian Legation and expressed deep regret at the arrests and discussed with the Italian Minister measures for settlement of the incident.—Reuter.

Durazzo, June 7.

Prince William of Wied has made a tour of the fortified positions outside the town. Commander Thomson who is charged with the organisation and arming of these positions and General Deweer, Commander-in-Chief of Gendarmerie, are going to Holland on leave.—Reuter.

Vienna, June 8.

Sofia, June 4.

Anti-Greek demonstrations occurred yesterday in Sofia and Varna. At the former place, the crowd removed and carried off the Greek flag which had been hoisted over the Greek church. The Bulgarian Government apologised for the incident. The people at Varna seized two Greek churches. Bulgarian Government has issued a statement, ascribing these outbreaks to the continual prosecution of the Bulgarians in the new Greek territories.

Sofia, June 5.

A Greek steamer, the "Florida," flying the American flag, with three hundred Moslem refugees and several deported Bulgarians on board, has arrived at Dedeagatch. The populace is excited and shops have been closed.

A meeting of protest has demanded the release of Bulgarians or expulsion of Greeks from Dedeagatch. Greece and Turkey.

Constantinople, June 8.

While the situation of the Greeks in Thrace has improved the Greeks on the Marmora and Aegean coasts of Asia Minor are being ousted wholesale by Mussalman refugees from Macedonia.—Reuter.

Athens, June 8.

Greece has renewed her vigorous protest against the prosecution of Greeks in Asia Minor. Besides her taking these steps in Constantinople the Greek Government has also drawn the attention of the Powers to the situation. The stream of refugees from Asia Minor has not abated. It is semi-officially announced that 25,000 Greeks are now at Chios awaiting steamers to convey them to Greece.—Reuter.

Constantinople, June 9.

Although yesterday was the feast of the Holy Trinity, all Greek churches were closed in pursuance of the decision of the Patriarchate. On a previous occasion, such action was taken. This was in 1090 when the churches were closed for three months. Several ambassadors have drawn the attention of the Ministers to the serious situation of the Greeks in the Empire. They have received assurances that measures will be adopted to remedy the matter.

London, June 4.

According to a telegram to the Times from Teheran the Tsar's approval to the appointment of Arfaed-Dowleh as Persian Minister in St. Petersburg has been withheld.

Indians in Canada.

Victoria, June 4.

The Indians on board the "Komagata" have cabled to the King and the Duke of Connaught stating that they have been starving for the last two days and that they have also been without water and have not been allowed to land for supplies. The authorities, however, say that they are well provided for.

Gurdit Singh has refused to pay the balance of the charter money until the passengers are allowed to land. If the money is not paid before the 12th instant the Captain will be ordered to return to Hong Kong.

Restlessness among the immigrants is increasing. They may "hunger strike" to call attention to their case. Gurdit Singh who has to provide their provisions refuses to do so while they are held prisoners.

Victoria, June 6.

The Indians on board the "Komagata Maru" are "hunger striking." They have had no food for 48 hours. Gurdit Singh does not participate, but refuses to interfere. Immigration officials decline to take action, and enquiry has been suspended as immigrants refuse to appear, maintaining that all or none must be allowed to land. Gurdit Singh proposed that the immigrants should be allowed to land temporarily, pending the decision of the court. He said that in the meantime, the ship could discharge her cargo. If this were done, he would agree to pay the balance of the charter money. The officials refused the proposal. It has been definitely ascertained that there are ample provisions and water on board, and that the immigrants' appeal to the King was based simply on a hunger-strike. The authorities are unwavering in their determination to enforce the regulations, but it is not known what action will be taken. If the charter money is paid, the ship can remain at Vancouver for four months. The Indians are engaged day and night in religious ceremonies.

Victoria, June 7.

Instructed by the Government a doctor has made an examination of the people on board the "Komagata Maru" and reports that there is no suggestion of starvation, either self-imposed or otherwise.

The owners of the vessel have instructed Lloyds' Agent to collect the price of the coal cargo and the balance of the charter money by the 11th inst. Another demand on Gurdit Singh for money has been refused, and if the monies are not paid by the 11th the Agent will instruct the captain to return to East.

Ottawa, June 8.

In the Dominion House of Commons on Saturday, the Minister of the Interior said that in accordance with his orders the Indians on board the "Komagata Maru," had been offered two tons of flour, two hundred pounds of rice, and bread and some fruit. The Indians had, however, refused to accept the offer unless fifty-five sheep and goats, a hundred live fowls, and two hundred boxes of cigarettes were included. The Minister added that the Department's agents feared no ill-effects from any hunger strike, as while the Hindus fasted by day, they fasted by night.

The member for Vancouver gave notice of an amendment to the Immigration Act excluding all natives, naturalised or not, coming from any country in Asia, south of the fiftieth parallel, except citizens of a country having a special agreement with Canada. It is not likely that the amendment will be considered owing to the lateness of the session.

Victoria: The Indians on board the "Komagata Maru" have abandoned the hunger-strike and asked immigration official for provisions, which were promptly supplied.

Lloyd's Agent is awaiting the reply of the ship's owners to the question as to whether to accept the offer of the Vancouver Hindus to meet the balance of charter expenses.

Gurdit Singh's intentions are not known. It has transpired that he proposed another sailing of the "Komagata Maru" direct from Calcutta in July and if initial voyages were successful the building of a £20,000 vessel to handle the new traffic.

The Captain of the "Komagata Maru" has notified her owners that he fears trouble if he is forced to return to Japan with the Indians.

Cape Town, June 8.

In the Union House of Assembly to-day, General Smuts moved the second reading of his Bill making provision for redress against certain grievances and removal of certain disabilities of His Majesty's Indian subjects in the Union. General Smuts reviewed the Commission's report the recommendations of which would be carried out partly by legislation and partly through administration. He paid a tribute to the assistance given upon many points which would otherwise have been very difficult. Especially was this the case with reference to marriage in connection with which, however, the Mahomedans were not yet satisfied, and he had promised to inquire into the precedent said to exist in Mauritius in connection with Mahomedans, who were allowed to marry up to four wives. The Bill granted free passage to Indians willing to return to India, and to forego their rights of residence in South Africa. General Smuts mentioned that some Natal members had expressed difficulties on that subject. In conclusion, General Smuts urged the House and especially the Natal members to assist the passage of the Bill in the present session. He regretted to see the matter arising in an acute form in another Dominion.

Colonel Sir Aubrey Wools Sampson said that the Indian strike in Natal had been engineered for political purposes. The Government would be doing a very unwise thing to concede to coloured men the demands made at the point of the bayonet. He feared that the concession on the Three Pound Tax would induce the belief that the Whites were unjust to the natives while they were just to Indians.

Mr. Leuchars (Natal) asserted that the natives would regard the Bill as a sign of weakness. The precedent would be inevitably followed by the natives.

Mr. Merriman announced that he would support the Bill, although not from any love of Indian immigration. The Indians had been dragged into South Africa like the Chinese. They had been landed in defiance of the wishes of the people, and the Bill was South Africa's bare duty. The House should do its best to aid the Imperial Government, not add fresh fuel to the fire.

A number of Natal members vehemently opposed the measure principally on the ground of the abolition of the Three Pound Tax.

Mr. Henwood (Natal) in expressing the opinion that the Bill solely affected Natal moved an amendment "that this House is not prepared to deal with the legislation for the relief of the Indians, until the subject matter of the Bill has been submitted to a referendum in Natal."

The opponents of the measure argued that the repeal of the tax would encourage Indian competition and eventually mean the Indianising of Natal. The tax operated in the direction of sending back Indians to India. The Bill would not help the Imperial Government, but would be immediately followed by further demands on the part of the Indians. Only one Natal member of the Assembly supported the Bill.

General Botha admitted the existence of amazing prejudice, but the difficulty was of Natal's own creation and South Africa's duty was to aim at peace and justice. He strongly urged that the native question was quite distinct from the Indian question, and deprecated confusion of the two. Mr. Henwood's amendment was impossible. The Indians were introduced by the wish of the majority of the people of Natal and the Government was now responsible to the whole Union. The Government must stand by the Bill, and he appealed to the House for assistance.

The Hertzogite, Mr. Niekirk moved the rejection of the Bill. He described the Indian leaders as dangerous agitators who should have been deported.

Mr. Boydell (Labour) moved the prohibition of further importation of indentured labourers into Natal, and the provision of inducements to Indians at present in the Union to return to India.

General Smuts, replying, quoted the Indian press opinion that the Bill was an honourable solution of a long struggle. Referring to the demand for repatriation, General Smuts declared emphatically that the Government would do everything to get Natal out of the mire. It would go a long way to obtain repatriation, and if inducements were necessary, they would be forthcoming.

The amendments were rejected, and the Bill was passed on the second reading by 60 votes to 24.

London, June 9.

Commenting on the Indian debate in the South African Parliament Daily News says that the attitude and speeches of the Natal Members of the assembly explains the discontent of the long-suffering Indians in Natal it is confident that the Union Government will be strong enough in the last resort peremptorily to overrule the opposition of Natal.

The Times says that it does not doubt that the views of Mr. Merriman and General Botha will prevail, but it is essential that the people in the Motherland should appreciate the Overseas point of view with regard to Asiatics.

A Wellington message to the Times says that Mr. Massey stated in reply to deputation that he hoped to introduce next session legislation excluding Indians from New Zealand.

The Westminster Gazette praises Mr. Smuts' speech and dwells on its admirable tact and moderation, adding "We are all thankful to Botha and his Ministry for the Bill."

The opponents of the measure argued that the repeal of the tax would encourage Indian competition and eventually mean the Indianising of Natal. The tax operated in the direction of sending back Indians to India. The Bill would not help the Imperial Government out would be immediately followed by further demands on the part of Indians.

Only one Natal member of the Assembly supported the Bill.

General Botha admitted the existence of amazing prejudice but the difficulty was of Natal's own creation and South Africa's duty was to aim at peace and justice. He strongly urged that the native question was quite distinct from the Indian question and deprecated the confusion of the two; Mr. Henwood's amendment was impossible. Indians were introduced by wish of the majority of the people of Natal and the Government was now responsible to the whole Union. The Government must Amend by the Bill and he appealed to the House for assistance.

The last annual meeting of the League was held at Dacca on the 13th April, 1914, and the old office-bearers were changed and the present ones elected in their stead. As the papers of the League were all with the Hon. Nawab Syed Nawab Ali Chaudhury Khan Bahadur, one of the late Secretaries, who was unavoidably absent from Calcutta on urgent family and business affairs, the work of the League could not begin for some time. The Hon. Nawab Sahab has, however, very kindly given us charge of all the League papers with him immediately after his arrival in Calcutta on the 23rd May last.

We had almost insurmountable difficulties in getting over the initial obstacles for organising the office of the League. There was hardly anything like a regular basis on which we could begin the work of the League. Some sort of order has, however, been brought about in the office. A Mahomedan graduate has been appointed as an Assistant in the office of the League. To place the working of the League on a satisfactory basis and to adopt concerted measures for the future plan of the work, a preliminary meeting of the leading Mahomedans of Calcutta was convened at 55 Chowringhee to help us with their suggestions and advice. Information about the changes in the office-bearers and office of the League has been sent to the authorities and the All-India Moslem League.

Apropos of a Resolution passed at the annual meeting, District Leagues and Anjuman have been addressed to, for electing and sending names of their representatives to the Council of the League. Resolutions of the last annual session have been published and sent to the authorities. Representation has been made to the Government on behalf of the residents of the village Mamudipur in Serajgunj regarding the acquisition of their village for purposes of Sara-Serajgunj Railway.

An ordinary meeting of the Council of the League was convened to transact business affairs. An emergency meeting of the Council of the League was also convened to consider the Kidderpur Mosque question.

Our London Letter.

ROWDY SCENE IN THE COMMONS; SITTING CLOSED ABRUPTLY.

The House of Commons was yesterday abruptly adjourned for grave disorder. Disorder is usually a matter for the back benches. But yesterday the Leader of the Opposition pointedly defied an appeal from the Speaker. For this defiance there is no precedent. It was clear that Mr. Bonar Law had the enthusiastic support of his Ulster colleagues.

With curious lack of humour, the Opposition shouted down, not a ministerialist, but Mr. Campbell, the spokesman for Ulster.

The House was full, many members finding places in the side galleries. Lord Londonderry occupied his now usual place over the clock. At first it seemed as if uneasiness was by no means confined to the Opposition. On more than one point there were artifices from the Liberal benches.

When, for instance, the Prime Minister announced that he hoped to take the Home Rule Division early on Tuesday, so as to enable the House to complete the adjournment motion that evening—and be free on Wednesday, which happens to be consecrated to the Derby—a number of members protested. Mr. Asquith had arranged the matter through "the ordinary channels"—that is, by joint agreement between the Whips,—but he undertook to consult the general convenience of the House.

Again, the proposal to introduce the Amending Bill in the House of Lords was objected to, not only by Unionists, like Mr. Butcher and Lord Robert Cecil, but by a number of Scottish Radicals.

"Has any representative body in Ireland asked for this Bill to exclude Ulster?" inquired Mr. Ginnell. Mr. Asquith admitted that there was no demand for the Bill in Ireland.

"Will this House know the contents of the Amending Bill before voting on the third reading next week?" asked Mr. Faber.

It was the crucial question repeated again and again during the afternoon.

"That matter can be raised in debate," said the Prime Minister.

"But will a member of the Government open the discussion by stating the terms of the Bill?" asked Mr. Bonar Law.

"I do not propose to do so," said Mr. Asquith. "The matter can be raised in debate."

As Mr. Cathcart Wilson pointed out an hour or two later, the Prime Minister is obviously working for peace. From the temper of the Opposition yesterday any offer would have been rejected. The only hope was to wait for a calmer moment.

As so often happens, there was a richly humorous interlude yesterday. Mr. Pirie accused Mr. McKinnon Wood of absenting himself during questions for the sake of "playing golf." The Secretary for Scotland, with elaborate emphasis, explained that Mr. Pirie had put another member's question without authority from that member, who had cancelled the inquiry. Mr. Wood was thus free to arrange an important Scottish conference for question hour.

Mr. Pirie was by no means inclined to let off the Secretary for Scotland so easily. Armed with precedents, he was about to narrate others of Mr. McKinnon Wood's delinquencies, when the Speaker intervened with the remark.

"The hon. member must not go into past history."

"Then, Mr. Speaker, I will only say this—on that occasion I accused the right hon. gentleman of playing golf—and he did not deny it."

The House roared with laughter. Mr. Asquith, for the moment, forgot that there was such a province as Ulster.

At the end of questions, Mr. Bonar Law repeated his appeal for the terms of the Amending Bill, before the main Bill was debated. Mr. Asquith—not the only statesman whose face betrayed strain—quietly but firmly declined to swerve from his procedure. Nothing, for the moment, happened. Two divisions, more or less formal, had to be taken on the Financial Resolution and the Committee stage, the figures being in the first case 316 to 228, a majority of 88; and in the second case 316 to 227, a majority of 89.

Lord Robert Cecil then rose and at once moved the adjournment of the debate. Mr. Asquith had not returned, and Lord Winterton led cries of "Where are the front bench?"

When Mr. Churchill entered he was ironically cheered, and the cheers were redoubled when he left again. Yet it would not have been surprising if the Liberal Leader had desired to consult his colleagues on the situation threatened by the Leader of the Opposition. Mr. Asquith was soon back again—perfectly cool, yet very grave and pale.

Lord Robert accused the Prime Minister of "extraordinary levity", of "deliberately insulting the House," of "dallying with the situation," while the South and West of Ireland were arming—(confused cheers)—"a fine result of Radical Government for eight years."

When Mr. Roch ventured to say "Hear, hear", Lord Robert sneered at "the blood and thunder group"—to be answered by cries of "Law and order." It was "a farce to discuss the Bill."

All the cheering was on the Tory side. Liberals, feeling some sense of responsibility for the peace of Ireland, sat, for the most part, silent.

"This Bill," argued Mr. Worthington Evans, "is not the Bill under which Ireland will be governed" (The Prime Minister dissents.) The Amending Bill was a mere "trick."

Mr. Asquith knew well that this was a moment when all might be won or all lost. His followers, personally loyal, were yet manifestly discouraged by the Government's persistence in making concessions. He was heard without the enthusiasm which burst forth a little later. One felt that the Opposition had a chance; how utterly has it been thrown to the winds!

Mr. Asquith speaking in a low voice, and without a note, told how the Tories regarded themselves as "the dominant party."

"So we are," called a Tory member, and the Prime Minister smiled.

"It is not the true situation," said he.

"This Bill is a wise and statesmanlike measure, containing adequate and abundant safeguards."

"Why amend it?" called a dozen voices, Mr. Remnant shouting, for some reason, "Preamble, preamble."

"This is not a public meeting," said the Speaker, but calls for "Reply" continued, while Lord Winterton contributed the refrain, "None-None-None."

"I have made a proposal for a peaceful settlement," continued Mr. Asquith.

"What is it?" interrupted the Tories.

"You called it a hypocritical sham," retorted the Prime Minister, "and I will not receive an inch from my position that the deliberate judgment of the House on the Home Rule Bill shall be recorded."

The House would have the last word on the Amending Bill, the introduction of which in the Upper House was the best means of promoting peace. As for degrading the House of Commons, "the Parliament Act is the greatest act of homage ever paid to the House of Commons."

"Contempt for this House"—that was Mr. Bonar Law's description of Mr. Asquith's policy. It will be seen how, later, the critic maintained the dignity of Parliament. The proposed Amending Bill was "ludicrous"—"an insult"—yet the Government, so unreasonable, was preparing "to use the whole forces of the Crown to drive loyal men out of the Union."

Under these circumstances, what was the use of continuing debate? Discussion was useless.

Certain private members followed. Mr. McCallum Scott, done and determined, thought that the Government had pressed conciliation to the point of weakness and begged the Prime Minister to reconsider his offer of an amending Bill. Let the Peers do the amending if they so desired. Consider North-East Derbyshire, where the majority for Home Rule was "overwhelming" and the Unionist Vote "insignificant." Cheers and counter-cheers greeted this allusion.

Shouts of laughter welcomed Mr. Ronald M'Neill and Mr. Amery when they rose together from the front bench below the gangway—biggest member completely obliterating smallest member. It was the touch of the ridiculous that cleared the air for a while.

Mr. Ronald M'Neill spoke in tones soothing to the ear, but the sense was charged with deadly mischief. "Duplicity"—that was his charge against the Prime Minister. "He has no intention of producing an Amending Bill at all. It is a mere way of escape if events prove too much for him."

"Bashi Bazouks," he cried, when Mr. Roch made a remark. "Bashi Bazouk" was his description of Sir William Byles.

Sir Henry Dalziel urged the Prime Minister to give way no further, as did Mr. Pringle.

Lord Hugh Cecil denied that Mr. Asquith had made any advances, and, amid loud Liberal cheers, he declared: "As an Opposition, we want no offers—no conciliation—no bargaining."

"Somebody is going to be tricked," he added. "It may be the Nationalists—it may be us—I cannot tell. Any way, the course is perfidious."

Mr. Page Croft had also his word to say on "disgraceful, base trickery"—on "robbers of poor boxes, thieves—kangaroos".

Insult reached a climax with Mr. Amery. "An old gentleman who can't make up his mind," cried he, pointing to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Asquith did not wince. But his face became very white.

"I may not have heard the hon. member," said the Speaker, "but, if I caught what he said, it was very improper."

"I withdraw 'an old man'" answered Mr. Amery, defiantly, adding with scorn, "The Prime Minister—a man of iron! He is an old piece of driftwood, covered with weeds and limpets. He drifted out with Gladstone and in with Lord Rosebery."

Again and again the Speaker intervened. "I have called the hon. member to order twice," he said. "A third time will be the last." "Oh, Oh," shouted Lord Winterton.

"Pogrom," was Mr. Amery's next subject, but again the Speaker intervened. "I will give the hon. member one more chance," said he. And the exhibition quickly came to an end.

The motion to adjourn was put from the chair and lost by 286 to 176, a majority of 110. The House was again crowded.

"The question is that this Bill be read a third time," said the Speaker.

"Mr. Campbell," said the Speaker.

Mr. Campbell started in his seat—hesitated—then rose to the box, some notes in his hand.

Liberals, Labour men and Nationalists sat quiet, ready as always to hear an Ulsterman on Ulster. Not so the Opposition.

A dull roar of "adjourn"—organised and deliberate—continued for many minutes. Mr. Campbell did not try to speak. He stood contented.

The Speaker rose at last, and there was immediate silence. No one was angry. The scene was mechanical—premeditated—official—to wreck any possible settlement.

"Hon. members," said the Speaker, with memorable dignity—"seem determined not to hear their leader."

There were loud ministerial cheers and cries of "Oh" from the Tory defenders of the dignity of the Commons. The Speaker continued:

"I will ask the Leader of the Opposition whether it is with his assent and approval that this is being done?"

A deafening shout rose from the Coalition benches. It was answered by sharp cries of "Oh, Oh" from the Tories—and "Don't answer." As for Mr. Bonar Law, he started as if he had heard a rifle shot.

He sprang to the table.

"Mr. Speaker," he retorted, "I would not presume to criticise what you consider your duty, but I know mine, and it is not to answer any such question."

The rejoinder evoked paroxysms of delight. Tories kept up shouting at the top of their voices, waving handkerchiefs and order papers, while the Speaker—their own man—a Conservative, if ever there was one—stood, himself now pale, motionless, insulted as no Speaker of modern times has ever been insulted, yet majestic in his dignity.

His voice was low, yet it carried from end to end of the seething chamber. His intonation was perfect.

"I had intended," said he, "inviting the right hon. gentleman to assist me in maintaining order"—quiet cheering from the Coalition—"but as I have been disappointed in that, there is nothing open to me except, under Standing Order 21, to suspend the sitting of the House, which I do until to-morrow."

He ceased. One caught a brief impression of the Serjeant-at-Arms shouldering the mace and with difficulty making his way out of the House in front of the Speaker.

Otherwise it was tornado. Tories yelled, clapped one another on the back, literally embraced Mr. Bonar Law.

Sir Edward Carson, with his responsibility for a hundred thousand rifles, was exultant. Mr. Amery, with his charges of provoking bloodshed, stood on the floor, danced like a schoolboy at a cricket match. Earl Winterton, as he passed out, put his hands to his mouth and yelled: "Go on with it alone."

Mr. Stanley Wilson, stentorian as ever, shouted: "Get your election addresses ready." "Three cheers for King John," cried Mr. Page Croft.

The floor was crowded, all parties commingling, and it almost seemed as if we should have physical violence.

But Mr. Asquith saved the situation. He sat with his colleagues, calm, the embodiment of the ordered traditions which have made of the House of Commons so noble an exemplar of Parliamentary prestige.

A torrent of obloquy swept over the Liberal leader as the Tories filed past him along the benches opposite. What the insults were it was impossible to distinguish, but they left him unmoved.

The restraint of Liberals and Labour members was perfect—a splendid achievement under intense provocation.

When the mass of Tories had left, the Prime Minister quietly rose. That was the signal for ministerialists. They sprang up as one man and gave the Liberal leader a great cheer, loud, long, sustained, waving handkerchiefs and order papers. And so it ended. With what result? A Speaker defied; a Prime Minister covered with grossest insult; the House of Commons deliberately degraded by the official opposition; conciliation wrecked.

The effect of the scene in the House yesterday is certain to be unfavourable for the Opposition in the country. So far it has been the proud boast of Englishmen, irrespective of party or creed, that, even during the most acute political crisis, the House of Commons, unlike the continental Legislative assemblies, would never lose its temper and that even the bitterest political opponent is given a fair hearing and is treated with that true sporting spirit for which the British race is famous. Recently, however, things have proved otherwise and yesterday's scene is notable in the fact that it was one of their own leaders that the Opposition refused to hear.

The Daily News in a forcible leading article, commenting upon yesterday's "Rebellion and Rowdiness", proceeds thus: "Whether it was planned by Mr. Bonar Law or whether Mr. Bonar Law, as so often before, allowed the most noisy and least intelligent of his followers to dictate to him, is a trifling question which a future historian of this chapter of events may be left to settle. . . . It may well be that the morning, as usual after a debauch, will bring to the Opposition regret for a blunder, if not repentance for a crime. That will not save them from emphatic condemnation at the hands of every citizen who believes in decency in public life, and who understands that concerted and premeditated disorder in the House of Commons lays the axe at the root of Parliamentary Government and free institutions. The people of these islands have been observing with growing disgust and uneasiness the steady conversion of the Unionist Party to anarchism in its vilest and crudest forms. Yesterday's display, when the new Unionism crystallised into coarse abuse and threatenings flung at Ministers and insults to the Speaker, should complete the process of illuminating the nation.

The Times also shows its disapproval of the methods adopted by the Unionists yesterday. In the course of a leader this morning it goes on to say: "Unionists evidently felt that they were wasting time in assisting in such futile proceedings; they decided to stop them, and they had their way. We understand their anger, but are nevertheless sorry that it took a form which brought them into conflict with the authority of the Chair. Disorderly episodes have consequences which outweigh the immediate object in view. They tend to destroy such respect as remains for Parliament in this country and throughout the Empire. The electorate does not like them: they bring no votes to the Unionist cause. While fully realising the exceptional circumstances, we should have been glad if yesterday's protest had been more decorous."

EGYPTIAN ENTHUSIASM FOR TURKEY.

According to the Cairo Correspondent of the Daily Mail the two Turkish airmen, Selim Bey and Keinal Bey, have arrived at Cairo from Constantinople (after an air tour of 1,500 miles). They subsequently proceeded to the Aerodroma (5 miles from Cairo) to fly before the public, who were admitted free. Enormous crowds had gathered and there was great enthusiasm and an outburst of Turcophil feelings among the Egyptians, who continually cheered and shouted: "Long live the Sultan," "Long live Turkey."

This report is of particular interest as it conclusively proves the absolute inaccuracy of the statements that had recently appeared in the Times (with which the Daily Mail, curiously enough, is now incorporated) to the effect that, as a result of Colonel Aziz Ali Bey's trial at Constantinople, a widespread anti-Turkish feeling has developed in Egypt. Such statements, of course, had not been made without any motive, as I have already tried to impress upon your readers in my previous letters; but those, who were at all acquainted with the true Egyptian sentiment, had never for a single moment attached any importance to the version given by the Times. The Daily Mail has happily spoken the truth and its Cairo Correspondent's report would certainly convince even the most superficial observer of the deep attachment and genuine sympathy for Turkey which have always prevailed in Egypt. The bond of union and devotion between the Egyptian Moslem and his co-religionist in the Ottoman Empire has never been stronger before—a simple yet hard fact which the Times and its compatriots have to face, in spite of their pretension as to its non-existence.

THE "TIMES" AND THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

An amusing though somewhat undignified controversy has arisen between the Times and the Daily Telegraph. The latter newspaper, until a few days ago, had for several years regularly published a statement daily to the effect that its weekly circulation is larger, to the extent of half a million copies, than that of any other penny morning daily in the United Kingdom. The reduction in the price of the Times in March last has evidently affected the popularity of this paper and so on Monday it had slightly modified its statement and now simply contends itself with merely mentioning that it has the largest circulation in the world.

The Times has challenged the Telegraph as to the truth of the statement, which it characterises as "erroneous and grotesque," and goes on to say that after the reduction in its price in March it has undoubtedly enjoyed the largest circulation. Since the Times is now periodically publishing the exact number of its issues actually sold from month to month, it called upon its contemporary to do likewise in order to let the public have an opportunity of realising the accuracy of its statement. This the Telegraph has promptly done and on Wednesday its readers were authoritatively informed, by means of the actual number of copies sold, that so far at any rate the sale of this journal is larger than that of the Times.

This keen advertising controversy between the two great journals, one is bound to feel, is not likely to enhance the prestige of British journalism, and the Pall Mall Gazette has already earnestly appealed to both the parties, now that they have both published their respective lists of sales, to let the matter drop and leave their readers to form their own conclusions.

The most humorous part of this farcical episode is the significant fact that, though the Times has always been loudest in its ever mindless cry of "prestige" in other fields, it has not hesitated to descend to the low depth of a "rag" bent on advertising itself at any cost, even at the risk of entering into a controversy with a great contemporary, in which so far as the reading public can judge on the strength of the authoritative figures published, the odds, or rather the "facts of the case," are against it.

One would have certainly expected the national organ of England to have considered such a step as rather infra dig and to have abstained from initiating a quarrel with another newspaper in London on such a feeble pretext. Can it be that Printing-House Square has forgotten its past "traditions"? Let us hope not, or else the journalistic world would be wickedly deprived of some of its most entertaining and amusing elements that not infrequently burst out—true to its past traditions—in the learned columns of this national journal of Great Britain! It would indeed be no less than a calamity if in future we are going to witness the extraordinary spectacle of the Times living with the times and actually labouring to impress upon the public mind that it enjoys the widest circulation and that it likewise enjoys the greatest popularity amongst all classes of people! Hitherto it used to boast of the fact that its readers had always been the exclusive and select portion of the community! Lord Northcliffe has finally shattered the very last fabric of this journal's past traditions and the surprising thing about it is that, in spite of the loss of the prestige of the Times, neither the Thames nor the Ganges has been set on fire. It is hard to believe that, though the national journal of Great Britain can now be actually bought for a copper and though it is being evidently conducted by its new owners in a spirit antagonistic to its cherished traditions and its accustomed loftiness, and notwithstanding the successive blows that have been lately administered to the prestige of the Times—the "Voice" of British public opinion—the British Empire and the Universe, for the matter of that, are still existing and are likely to exist!

RE-OPENING OF OTTOMAN PARLIAMENT: SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

The Ottoman Parliament was re-opened on Thursday last—(14th May) by his Imperial Majesty, our beloved Khalifat. A brilliant escort accompanied the Sultan from his palace at Dolma-Baghche to the Houses of Parliament at Fındıklı.

The speech from the Throne cannot fail to make a deep and favourable impression on the Ottoman nation. It touched on the principal events which have taken place since the closing of Parliament on 5th August 1912. The Italian war, the revolutionary crisis, the suffering and distress of the whole Ottoman nation, the cruel captivity so patiently and courageously borne by the Ottoman prisoners of war, the gallant resistance of the troops at Tchatalja where they repeatedly drove back the violent attacks of the enemy, the courage and endurance of the troops when assailed by disease and hunger, the glorious defence of the besieged towns by the Ottoman soldiers—all these proved that the nation still possessed the same virtues which had distinguished their forefathers. The courage, the discipline, the prompt action which signalled the re-taking of Adrianople and the efforts of those who laboured to inspire the sentiment of security and confidence in the mind of the nation are to be remembered with pride. The speech from the Throne then expressed a strong desire for a pacific solution of the Islands question and continued that the reforms in the interior are to be submitted to severe control and inspection so as to insure public security and tranquillity along with economical development. The concessions granted to France for the construction of railways and ports will give new life to the provinces and so improve the immense resources of the Ottoman Empire. Whilst regaining her credit and developing, in peace and security, the natural resources of her soil and sub-soil, Turkey will not forget to repair the losses and misfortunes sustained by her military forces. The speech then appealed to the nation to second the efforts of the Ministers of War and Marine in increasing the strength of the Ottoman Army and Navy.

A few days ago, when at the National Defence League, I had the pleasure of meeting and conversing with Halil Halid Bey, ex-Ottoman Consul General at Bombay. He spoke with great enthusiasm of his stay in India and of the development, social, intellectual and commercial, among our Mohamedan brothers there, also of the warm welcome he had received on every occasion. Of Mr. Mohamed Ali of the Comrade and his unselfish work he spoke in the highest terms of praise.

"It is any ill wind that blows nobody any good," so runs the old proverb. This maxim finds an application here in Turkey. Since the Balkan war a real activity among our Mohamedan population has manifested itself. High functionaries of State have given up their posts to devote their energies and means to industrial and commercial enterprises. Already in Constantinople has been formed an association of Turkish merchants whose aim is to assure the development of commerce. We can now reasonably hope that a brilliant future awaits the Ottoman Empire.

M. SAID, HINDUSTANI.

TETE À TETE

The Hon. the Chief Commissioner of Delhi made a very humorous speech after a masonic banquet at Delhi last January but concluded it with an unexpected seriousness by referring to the need of masonry in such a country as India where people were divided into many divergent creeds and at such a time when, according to Mr. Hailey, some mischief-makers were trying to rouse their religious passions and prejudices. Still more recently a District Officer in the United Provinces communicated to an acquaintance the terrible State secret that Government had an eye on a certain person who was every day accumulating against himself all the materials for a deportation by working upon the religious feelings of Indian Mussalmans. Well, even if we haven't discovered this arch-fiend, we have discovered a good deal of "the Plot" (with apologies to the Tory Press of London) and possibly one of the many fellow conspirators. It appears that this arch-fiend induced Italy to "annex" Tripoli and butcher the Arabs on the Oasis in 1911, at the same time persuading Lord Kitchener to declare the "neutrality" of Egypt and Sir Edward Grey to look the other way. Subsequently this awful person arranged a coup in India by bringing the Government of India round to annul the Partition of Bengal on the ground that Indian Mussalmans were "loyal and contented"—the last thing apparently that Government wanted them to be. Not satisfied with this provocation, he arranged for the bombardment of the Holy Sepulchre of Imam Riza at Meshed, the hanging of Persian divines and the Russian occupation of Northern Persia. Even Morocco could not escape the vile machinations of this wretch and he handed over the Moors to the civilizing influence of French pénétration pacifique. This ubiquitous rascal then visited the Court of every Balkan Prince and arranged the massacre of half a million Turks, men, women and children, and while inducing Sir Edward Grey to remain as silent as a grave, persuaded many other English Ministers to utter the most silly and wicked things including the futile threats of the Prime Minister at Birmingham after his equally foolish assurances of the fruits of victory to the victor at the Guildhall. Then this vile person retraced his steps towards India and his hand was once more visible when he destroyed a mosque at Cawnpore and exerted his influence with Mr. Tyler for the shooting down of old men and children that grieved over the destruction of that mosque. Even the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province was compelled to discover that although in nine cases out of ten he would gladly comply with the requests of his Taluqdar friends, this was the tenth. This imp of mischief became so fond of pulling down mosques, that one near the Kidderpore Docks at Calcutta was damaged and many dedicated to the god of destruction, besides those of Agra, Hapur and Dulla that were demolished completely, and we have reason to believe that he has some hand in the invention of a new Quran. But his latest handiwork is a master-stroke of genius as the following telegram would show:—

A case of considerable interest to Mahomedans, not only in Sind but throughout India, has come before the City Magistrate of Karachi. It appears that during this week the proprietor of the "Picture Palace" Karachi, has been exhibiting a film entitled "Azim." The film depicts an imaginary episode in the life of the Holy Prophet (Mahomed). According to the story thrown upon the screen the Prophet was in love with a beautiful woman named Salika, the wife of one of his generals named Azim. Following closely the story of David and Bathsheba as narrated in the Christian Bible, the Prophet, in order to get rid of her husband, sent Azim to the wars, where he was reputed to having been killed. Whereupon the Prophet pressed his attentions upon the widow, who repulsed him. Finally the long lost husband turned up, and surmounting all the wiles of his wife's lover carried her off in triumph. It is alleged that some Mahomedan members of the audience at the Picture Palace protested against what they regarded as a blasphemous exhibition, but no heed was paid to them.

This, as we have said, was a master-stroke of genius, for if neither Tripoli nor the Balkans, neither Persia nor Morocco, neither Cawnpore nor Calcutta would provoke the Mussalmans, this latest plot at Karachi was bound to do it. Dr. Mingana's Quran can only be read by the literate, but Mr. Greenfield's latest "Hades" concerning the Prophet of Islam can be seen as a moving picture by all alike. Really this Mussalman fanatic knows how to rouse the religious passions and fanaticism of his co-religionists in spite of all the antidotes provided by the creator of the "Indian Peril." The Deputy Commissioner who suggests merely deportation is a very milk-and-water sort of District Officer. The least which this fiend deserves is being hanged, drawn and quartered and then flung into a cauldron of boiling pitch. If this sort of namby-pamby disposition continues to show itself in our District Magistrates when dealing with such wicked and vile plotters, we are afraid, we shall have to send them to the Balkans to learn something of the art and science of making the punishment fit the crime.

This is "the Plot", and who shall say that this is not worse than the worst of which Mr. Winston Churchill is capable? But if like Bengali juries, according to Sir J. D. Rees, our benign Government is not going to believe in the guilt of this man, then, may we hope, that it will unravel the mystery of the Karachi Picture Palace film? Will it not ask Mr. Greenfield to explain for the benefit of seventy million Mussalman why it was that he selected an already distraught community for his brutal jest. The Prophet of Islam has been maligned by every "trafficker in souls" who has dealt with his life with a view to make capital out of it for Christianity. The Prophet's many marriages are a perpetual theme for the display of the coarseness and prurience of Christian evangelists, and this has gone on uninterruptedly for thirteen hundred years. Was not "History" romantic enough that an admitted romance is now being resorted to for the purpose of vilifying a holy personality of whom it could be said with greater justice than that of any other man:

Whatever record leap to light
He never shall be shamed.

If all that Mr. Greenfield desired was to make his Picture Palace rival the attractions of such theatres as the Bishop of Kensington has recently denounced, and improve upon those of Miss Maude Allen, may we not ask if civilized Paris and London could not furnish the material for which the arid desert of Arabia has been explored? Could not the proceedings of English Divorce Courts supply all the paraphernalia for Mr. Greenfield's films? We should have thought that even the royal houses of Europe would have acted on their ancient motto of noblesse oblige. And if an oriental mise-en-scène was an absolute necessity, we should be surprised if Simla would not have sent its latest plain tale from the hills or a departmental ditty suitable for the occasion. We have a faint recollection that there lived once upon a time in Lahore a young English journalist of the name of Rudyard Kipling who imagined the Last Trump blowing on Hurnai, and slithered and thought he would not like to be the man who sent Jack Brown to Quetta. On looking into the matter a little more closely, we would not be surprised if the hero of Mr. Greenfield's film, "Azim" is our old friend Jack Brown in disguise. But a truce to this banter. The matter is too serious even for sarcasm, and if the Government does not know it already the Government had better know it now. We understand that the matter is sub judice and all that we have written is based on the telegram we have reproduced. The description of the film in the complaint filed in Court shows the reality to be still worse. We await the result of the legal proceedings against Mr. Greenfield, and we are sure the Mussalmans of Karachi, and for the matter of that the Mussalmans of India, would preserve the same correct attitude that they have hitherto maintained in this connection. But the matter is not a stray incident which can be settled by a Law Court. Government will have to satisfy us that the recent speech of the Bishop of Calcutta about Islam and the dealings of the Punjab Government with Moslem religious papers are in no way connected with this affair. The Mussalmans have put up with a lot in recent years, but it is not wise statesmanship to believe that 70 million members of a virile race can all remain like patience smiling on a monument in the face of repeated provocation. The Hon. the Chief Commissioner of Delhi will have to think of something more solid than masonry to prevent the rousing of religious passions and prejudices and our kind friend the U. P. Deputy Commissioner will have to devise some new bogey wherewith to frighten his enfants terribles.

It is satisfactory to note that the circular issued some time ago by the Government of India on the subject of Moslem Education, has evoked practical response from several local Governments. Special committees to consider and suggest suitable measures were appointed in several provinces, some of which have already submitted their recommendations. The report of the committee appointed by the Bihar and Orissa Government has just been published. The committee negatives the suggestion of providing an Islamic Faculty in connection with the proposed Patna University on the grounds that "the Islamic Faculty in connection with the Dacca University was in the nature of an experiment and had not yet been sanctioned and that the Moslem University had not yet reached the stage of fruition and it would be imprudent for the Patna University to enter into competition with it in any way." We do not know what an "Islamic Faculty" is intended to mean. The provision of an alternative course of Islamic studies in the curriculum for the B. A. degree would naturally prove attractive to Moslem students provided it is so devised and proportioned as to ensure to the boys an adequate grounding in modern subjects. In that case the creation of an "Islamic Faculty" in connection with the Patna University, or with any other University for the matter of that, would be welcome. Such an arrangement would in no wise diminish the usefulness of the Aligarh University, but, on the contrary, would increase its attractiveness. But if an "Islamic Faculty" means an addition of a mere adjunct to a modern University as a concession to Mussalmans for their love of their old learning, an adjunct that would be self-sufficing and have little organic relation to the University teaching, then it must be clearly understood that Mussalmans have no taste for such a luxury nor is Aligarh dreaming of such a stultifying thing as that. The committee makes various suggestions for the improvements of maktabs. It is no doubt true that Mussalmans on the whole prefer to send their boys to maktabs instead of to primary schools, and the best course is to help in improving maktab teaching without impairing its essential features as regards control and administration. The committee suggests that model maktabs should be placed in central positions. It also suggests that Mianji training schools should be replaced by Moslem teachers' training schools and recommends the grant of stipends for trained teachers. These are very useful and practical suggestions. We also entirely endorse the committee's recommendation that maktabs conforming to the departmental syllabus should have the same claims on local bodies as the primary schools. On the subject of madrasahs the committee recommends that a course should be framed with a view to encouraging students who have real interest in Islamic studies and that one Government Madrasah should be established at Patna. A European scholar of eminence is recommended for the principalship of the Madrasah, and it is also agreed to send a qualified Beharee scholar for training in Europe for the post of superintendent of the Madrasah. The committee has rejected the suggestion to appoint an Assistant Director of Public Instruction to be in special charge of Moslem education. We regret we can not say that the committee was well-advised in this decision. Throughout India the four chief educational needs of Mussalmans are Moslem educational inspectors, Moslem teachers, liberal facilities for the education of poor Moslem students and adequate provision for Islamic studies including religious instruction. In every province efforts should be made to devise practical measures with these needs prominently in view. The Bihar and Orissa committee has failed to grasp the need of strengthening the inspecting staff with an effective Moslem element. In other respects its suggestions are both useful and practical, and we trust the provincial Government will take early steps to carry them into effect. As regards an effective increase in the number of Moslem teachers and Moslem educational inspectors, the Government of India circular has already emphasised its importance, and we trust the provincial Government will do all that is necessary in this direction.

One must live and learn. The Pioneer's remarks about the attempts to "boom" the Nationalist Volunteers are sound practical advice "to all whom it may concern." The Pioneer is not going to make the "grievous mistake of the Home Radical papers in laughing at the Ulster Volunteers" by remarking that "there is something theatrical and melodramatic about these warriors of Mr. Devlin." It therefore provides the Nationalists with the recipe of a successful revolt. "In these days," says the Pioneer, "battles cannot be won by mere bravery." (Not even that of the Pioneer's hero, Kanhai Lal Dutt, we presume.) "It is training, organisation, equipment and above all leading which turns the scale." Then follows a description of the rebellious activities of Ulster and the praise of the "distinguished General"—an Anglo-India General, be it remembered—at their head. After this comes the appraisal of the Nationalist Volunteers. "For several decades Roman Catholic Ireland has been more or less in open opposition to the Government, and their opposition has taken the form of secret societies, terrorism, murders, cattle-maiming and boycotting. Naturally these ebullitions produced no effect upon Government. Ulster has "shown in two years how resistance to what is regarded as legal tyranny ought to be arranged. . . . Its effect upon Government has been very marked indeed. Very late in the day 'the Nationalists have seen that this is the right way to do things,' and they have frankly pirated their rivals' ideas. . . . Drill and discipline as a means of resistance are a vast improvement on the 'time-honoured policy of shooting landlords and policemen from behind hedges.' Every terrorist in India must be immensely beholden to the Pioneer for this instruction calculated to make 'the complete rebel'." It has for long been a pioneer of unsuccessful servility to Indians, and we congratulate it on turning over a new leaf and becoming a pioneer of successful sedition. Well, whosoever wants an effective rebellion must catch the rebels young. Now, who's for a corps of Boy Scouts in every school, with a pensioned sepoy as Scout Master, and a retired Resaldar Major as India's General Richardson in organising India's Volunteers to resist "what is regarded as legal tyranny"?

We are glad to note that, as expected, the Hon. Mr. A. K. Fazal Huq, the new Honorary Secretary of the Bengal Presidency Moslem League, has earnestly commenced the work of making the Bengal League something more than a mere name, which it had become after the resignation of Mr. Sultan Ahmad from the office of Joint Honorary Secretary some three years ago. Along with a bulletin, which we publish elsewhere, he sends us the following note:—"The Bengal Presidency Moslem League was formed 'with a view to represent the cause of the political advancement of the Mussalmans of Bengal, and its existence can only be justified when 'the members of the community throughout the Presidency extend their help and co-operation and take an active part and interest in all its affairs. It is to be regretted that the operations of 'the League have so long been mainly confined to Calcutta and no 'regular attempts seem to have hitherto been made to make it the 'truly representative political organisation of the Mussalmans of 'Bengal. It is ultimately the public with whom and for whom the 'League exists. The days when an association could be started, financed 'and worked by individuals have passed away. With public 'opinion becoming a factor in Indian politics, public opinion expressed 'through the League must more and more tend to be the true index 'of the opinion of the public. The political activities of the Mussal- 'mans in India began only in 1906, and very little has been 'accomplished towards generating the spirit of a living interest in 'politics among the Mussalmans in general. Such a state of affairs 'must perforce be the accumulated fruit of years' work, but in the 'meantime efforts should be made to induce the public to take a 'watchful interest in all the affairs of the League. In order, 'therefore to create such an interest in the affairs of the League 'among the Mussalmans of Bengal, and with a view to keep the 'general public always informed about the real and internal working 'of the League and to give them opportunities to study, discuss 'and criticise its affairs, it has been decided to issue henceforth 'periodical bulletins from the office of the League to be published in 'the newspapers.' A very good resolve too, and may the Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi take a lesson from Bengal!

We publish below a letter sent to the Times for publication by Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din Sahab on the subject of the much-advertised "discovery" of some manuscripts which are supposed to throw new light on the text of the Quran. The letter was not published. No comment is necessary. It was so Times-like! We shall shortly deal with the whole subject in detail and see what this "discovery" amounts to. The Khwaja Sahab's letter is as follows:—"Sir,—It really amused me to read what 'appeared in your columns of 25th April under the above heading. It 'speaks of some discovery made at Cambridge as to certain variants 'and interpolations found in the text of the Quran by Dr. Mingana 'on the authority of some MSS. I need not say anything at present as 'to the reliability of the MSS., but what has been selected by 'the writer in your columns as a specimen of the alleged inter- 'polation is not a happy choice. It hardly brings any credit 'to the scholarly attainments of Dr. Mingana if he is really 'responsible for it. It is said that 'the 35 pages which Dr. Min- 'gana has deciphered show at least 35 variants, and the omission of 'four interpolations, most of them being decided improvements on 'Zaid's text. For instance, Sura 17 begins 'When we knelt (not 'when we blessed) round the Harem.' One with an ordinary 'knowledge of Arabic could not have selected this verse for the 'advertisement of his discoveries, and I would advise Dr. Mingana 'to think twice before he hazards his reputation as Professor of 'Semitic languages in the seminary at Mosul for 13 years. 'To find variants in the reading of the Quran is not a new dis-

"every. I may supply Dr. Mingana with many a variant known to us from the very beginning of Islam. But he should remember that the variants in the Quran have got a significance quite different from that in the Bible. There are ten different readings of various Quranic verses, but this is confined only to the pronunciation and variations in vowel-points of certain words in the text. It is owing to provincialism and does not affect the meaning. For instance, the opening words of every chapter in the Quran, usually translated in English 'In the name of God, the most compassionate, etc.,' have got some eight different readings. I give three of them here:—(a) Bismilla hirrahma nirrahimi; (b) Bismillahirrahman nirrahimi; (c) Bismilla hirrahma nirrahimu. The concluding portion of the first verse of the opening chapter of the Quran has got three well-known variants: (a) Malike yomiddien; (b) Malake yomiddien; (c) Malake yomiddien; but they do not affect the meaning. In order to appreciate the mistake presumably made by Dr. Mingana in the so-called interpolation, one should first know the character of Arabic writing. The vowel-points are never given in any word, but if necessary they are given not in the body but on the margin of the words. They are usually shown when the writing is meant for a stranger or beginner of the language. For illustration I take three consonant letters B.R.K. They will have different readings by the change of vowel-points, as for example: Biraka, Barka, Burk, Barke, Barki, and so forth. In the Arabic writing we will find only B.R.K., but the context will enable us to read it with the required vowels. Before the spread of Islam in the non-Arabic nations the Quran also was written without any vowel-points; but when non-Arabic speaking nations needed the Book the text in the days of Yusuf bin Hajaj was given these points. With this in view the alleged interpolation of Dr. Mingana will not appear so to your readers. I first give the translation of the whole of the 1st verse of Surah 17 in question, in the words of Rodwell: 'Glory be to Him who carried his servant by night from the sacred temple of Mecca to the temple that is more remote, whose precinct we have blessed, that we might shew him of our signs.' The verse contains the word Birakna, which means 'we blessed,' but read it as Barakna and it means 'we knelt.' In the ancient text we find only Brkna without vowel-points and could as I have explained above. One may read it Birakna (we blessed) or Barakna (we knelt) as he is advised by the context or common-sense. There are various reasons, grammatical and others, which do not allow us to read it otherwise than as Birakna (we blessed). They will be enumerated on the appearance of Dr. Mingana's book; but even the use of ordinary common sense would induce one to reject Dr. Mingana's reading. It is not man who says "we blessed" (or knelt round) the precincts of the temple, but God. To say of God as kneeling round a temple is an absurdity and gross insult to the Moslem conception of God. God may bless a temple, but not kneel before it. It is decidedly anything but an improvement on the text. Dr. Mingana perhaps takes "we" (we knelt or blessed) for man and hence the error. If by simply reading Barakna instead of Birakna he jumps upon a discovery, he need not trouble himself in deciphering the MSS. Any ancient copy of the Quran will supply him with hundreds of variants."

In concluding its comments on the oratory at the recent Calcutta Dinner held in London our esteemed contemporary, the Pioneer, says: "The Bishop of Calcutta said a thing which no one else could have said so fitly when he remarked

"that commercial Englishman supplied in the task committed to Great Britain in India those qualities of straight, honourable and just dealing of which India stood sorely in need." A chapter could be written on this text, but we all know what His Lordship meant, and we know that it is true." Really the Pioneer speaks in conundrums nowadays. The text is before us all no doubt, but the sermon can be considered obvious only by the Pioneer and its clientele. But if guessing is part of the game, may we hazard the remark that the Statesman did preach the sermon? Whether it did so fitly or not we leave the Pioneer to decide. Chaffing under Lord Hardinge's well-deserved rebuke about "irresponsible statements made by interested persons," the Statesman, representative, we may presume, of that great exemplar of "straight, honourable and just dealing", the commercial Englishman, repudiated the charge of Calcutta commercial criticism being interested by saying that its clients "have not lost a rupee by the transfer" and, carrying the warfare into the enemy's camp, wrote: "Lord Hardinge and his Council have been considerable gainers. His Excellency receives a considerable entertaining allowance. How much has been saved by the attenuated hospitalities of Delhi? Members of Council are paid an absurdly high salary to compensate them for the "expensiveness of Calcutta. What rent are they paying in Delhi?" Is this an epitome of the "chapter" to which the Pioneer refers? If so, may we remind the Government of India that they are not beneath "hatred or contempt", and that if the Statesman's remarks "are likely" or may have a tendency directly . . . to bring into "contempt . . . the Government established by law in British India", in the words of that valetudine of Indian journalists, the Press Act, those of the Pioneer too cannot escape the widespread net of . . . indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, "allusion, metaphor, implication or otherwise." We can well understand the Statesman's "disinterested" lament at the loss of rent from the Government of India officials who were compensated by absurdly high salaries for the expensiveness of Calcutta, though Calcutta, according to the Statesman, did not, by some curious system of book-keeping, lose a single rupee by the transfer. We can understand still better its still more "disinterested" wail at the attenuated hospitalities of Delhi, for snobbishness is no sin according to the Metropolitan's decalogue, and in no way lowers the ethical reputation of the commercial Englishman whether he be a City Alderman at home or a jute-wallah abroad. But why need the Pioneer complain of the attenuated hospitalities of Delhi? One of its editors is always at Delhi or Simla, and surely the Government of India have not forgotten the Persian poet's recipe for sewing up the mouths of some of God's creatures.

THE establishment, some weeks ago, of the Egyptian Chamber of Commerce has been commented upon in very favourable terms by the correspondents of several English papers. It has been hailed as a sign of the awakened interest among the Egyptians in regard to the growing commercial importance of their country. The reports are practically unanimous in their views about the value and utility of this step and about the high business qualities and character of the Egyptian merchants, both Moslem and Copts, who have taken the lead in the matter. A distinguished Egyptian was said to have gone to Italy as a representative of the Chamber with the object of creating greater facilities for commercial intercourse between the two countries. All accounts, in fine, agree in their estimates both of the need of such a Chamber and of the capacity, earnestness and high business training of the men who have organised it. And yet "a correspondent" of the Capital thinks that no practical good would come out of the organisation. He says that from its initiation the Chamber was paralysed "by the aggressive attitude the Mohamedan members took up towards the Copts." It can, of course, do no violence to the spirit of our Calcutta contemporary if its correspondents are occasionally eager to claim a prerogative of opinion in all commercial matters. But this correspondent goes on better and quietly assumes the tone of an authoritative expert on the psychology of races and creeds. He delivers himself thus: "To the Moslem of the Near East, nothing is secular. His political, commercial and all other ideas are intimately associated with his religion. The one cannot be divorced from the other. To him, Turkey is not Turkey or Egypt Egypt. He has no country—only the area bounded by his religion. The Moslem of Egypt, though he is indigenous to the country, and his forebears through generations have been reared there, feels he is more akin to the Turk, or the Central African negro than he is to the Copt, an Egyptian subject, or to the Syrian, a Turkish subject. With the two former he has the affinity of religion. With the two latter, possibly some blood connection, but that is as nothing. They are poles asunder. Their religion is different. The Moslem of Egypt has, therefore, been quite unable to grasp the meaning of an Egyptian Chamber of Commerce—an institution dealing purely with commercial economics and designed to assist purely indigenous firms irrespective of the religion of the proprietors. A Moslem Chamber he could have understood and been enthusiastic about, but to be called upon to legislate commercially with people of another religion as confreres, even if for the good of his fatherland, has been beyond him." Much of the implied sneer of this deliverance is a Moslem's pride and glory. He has never sought kinship through the accidents of geography and ethnology. His creed has revealed to him profounder affinities of the spirit, which recognise no such fetters as colour or race and bring man and man into real, vital harmony of thought and feeling. Still, however, Islam does not prescribe religious exclusiveness. It is not a set of abstruse doctrines subtly designed in the shape of a metaphysical labyrinth, nor are its ideals a sort of spiral staircase leading up to the heights of the Infinite. History teems with examples of Mussalmans having initiated fruitful co-operation with their non-Moslem neighbours in the material, productive toil of life. The correspondent of the Capital is only one of a host of pseudo-philosophers who ape philosophy and are busy spinning crude and shallow generalities about things that usually lie beyond their narrow mental ken. We have no quarrel with a tribe that knows the price of everything and the value of nothing. The Leader of Allahabad quotes the ridiculous effusion of the correspondent of the Capital with considerable satisfaction and traces through it "a close family resemblance to the attitude of Mohamadens in India towards the Hindus and public questions." If the Leader means thereby that Indian Mussalmans, too, like every true Moslem in Egypt and elsewhere, are not groping hopelessly in a spiritual fog, it is right. It will cure the Leader's vanity a good deal to place the conclusions of Mr. Gait on Hinduism in his second paper on the Census of India side by side with the remarks of Capital's correspondent about the Mussalmans. Indian Mussalmans are not ashamed of being Mussalmans, and are thankful to think that they are not perpetually harassed by an acute necessity of defining their faith by solemn conference. As regards their attitude towards Hindus and public questions, well, the Leader can not presumably be in doubt about this when it regards it quite clear "that the need for the Hindus to organise themselves for the protection of their interest is as imperative as ever." How difficult it is to hide the cloven hoof of separatism under the verbiage of nationalism on Congress platforms.

At the annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society at the Queen's Hall in London in the first week of May, Dr. Lefroy, Bishop of Calcutta, discussed the problem of Mohamedan evangelisation and the splendid possibilities and hopes which presented themselves in connexion with it if only the Church would rouse herself in some kind of adequate measure and tackle the work in real earnest. The problem, said the Metropolitan, had never received a tenth part of the attention its importance demanded. It was a case of the Cross or the Crescent; there could be no neutrality, according to the Bishop, between the two; one or the other must conquer. The only sound method of Christian defence against the onward march of Mohamedanism, said Dr. Lefroy, must be that of attack, the Church throwing itself heart and soul into the great cause, winning the Mohamedan world to allegiance to Christ. We are sure this will be highly interesting reading to Indian Mussalmans. May we also hope it will be equally instructive? First the Kikuyu Conference, then the Sunday School Convention and now the Right Reverend Bishop of Calcutta's cheerful prospect of an "attack". Bishop Lefroy's "Muscular Christianity" is a notable feature, and this frontal attack is characteristic of him. Possibly Islam has little to fear from such charges, which like that of the Light Brigade, may be "magnificent but not war" if the usual methods of evangelization adopted by Christian Missionaries in Moslem lands be kept in mind. What Islam has to fear most are "the flanking movements." Dr. Mingana's "Quran" and Mr. Greenfield's latest "Hadees" are to be feared much more than Bishop Lefroy's sermons. When our Pamphlet Case was being argued at Calcutta, the learned Advocate-General had condemned the Macedonia Pamphlet chiefly, almost solely, on the ground that a sharp antithesis appeared to him to have been drawn between the Cross and the Crescent. Of course, Mr. Norton had pointed out that the antithesis was none of the Turk's creation, but was the handiwork of King Ferdinand and his Allies. He could have gone further and said that while at least three Crusades had been waged against Islam by Christendom, not one Jihad could be traced in history in which the entire Moslem World combined in the same manner against Christianity. Islam has always believed in defence not defiance. The Hon. the Advocate-General of Bengal is within the diocese of the Bishop of Calcutta and he would, we trust, note with interest the sharp antithesis drawn by the Right Reverend Bishop between the Cross and the Crescent. Of course, there is no neutrality between the two, at least not between the Unity of Islam and the Trinity of the Nicene Creed. No Mussalman could indeed wish for neutrality. One or other must conquer, and the Mussalman is sure in his mind which it is going to be.

Dr. Lefroy's "method of Christian defence" is characteristic of the blessed meek that shall inherit the kingdom of the earth. He must needs attack. But with what weapons? Those of the body, as in the Balkans? Or those which even an anti-clerical Government such as the French is employing in Algiers and Tunis where the Hajis being prohibited now, as it is declared to turn loyal French subjects who drink absinthe and enjoy the can-can into forces of disloyalty, austere in morals and fearing God only? What did Mr. Asquith say? Yes, yes, wait and see.

The Comrade.

Dignity or Impudence?

To most Mussalmans Etawah has two great associations. It was the home of the late Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk Bahadur, that brilliant and most amiable, if unfortunately also a somewhat weak, leader of the Mussalmans. And it is also the home of one of Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk's greatest friends and most trenchant critic, Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab, editor of Al-Bashir, and the sole founder of the Etawah Islamia High School in as true a sense as Sir Syed Ahmad Khan was the sole founder of the Aligarh College. Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab has enjoyed the universal respect of Mussalmans for close upon a quarter of a century as a devoted worker in the cause of Mussalmans. He may not have brought great intellectual qualifications to his work, but he brought to it a persistence and an earnestness of character that so many of the younger men have lacked grievously. And he brought to it, what all Aligarh Old Boys particularly admire in him, a devotion to Sir Syed Ahmad Khan that amounted almost to idolatry. Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab has rendered the Mussalmans great service throughout his career as a journalist, particularly in putting up a valiant fight in the days of Sir Antony MacDonnell for Urdu against the encroachments of bigoted separatists who wish to boycott Urdu because it has been splendidly enriched by Mussalmans from Persian and Arabic sources.

But while gratefully acknowledging these services and offering to him the tribute of well deserved praise for his high character, the progressive section of Mussalmans has painfully realised that with advancing age Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab has failed to "grow" in his views, whether on politics or on education. He has not yet realised that even the greatest of men hardly ever accomplish in their lifetime all that they desire, and that even if any of them does accomplish it, his life-work may be the salvation of his own generation, but it cannot assure the salvation of succeeding generations, unless his successors continue, extend and amplify his plans in accordance with the ever new circumstances as they arise from day to day. If some great statesman, educationist, or soldier continued to live far beyond the psalmist's span of life and remained in the fullest enjoyment of his faculties to the last, can it be supposed that he would not alter and modify, and in some cases completely reverse, his earlier policies and plans at the dictation of changing circumstances? Even those who enjoy no such extraordinary longevity and youthful vigor of body and mind are oftentimes compelled to retrace their steps and change their course, destroy what they had built up and build again according to a different plan. The moment they cease to do so, rest assured they have shed not only the youth of the body but also the youth of the mind, and that although they may continue to live, they have ceased to grow.

Sir Syed Ahmad's own career illustrates these obvious facts of life, and his greatest quality was that he took a longer view of things than his contemporaries and was of course never behind the times. Well, Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab has much of the persistence of Sir Syed and an absorbing devotion to him and his ideals; but he will pardon us if we say that, unlike another devoted disciple of Sir Syed, namely, Mushtaq Husain, Viqar-ul-Mulk, he does not possess Sir Syed's secret of perpetual youth. It was given to Syed Ahmad Khan in his generation to locate the centre and find the radius. But his long life was not long enough—and no man's life can ever be long enough—to describe the full circle of Moslem salvation. He has, however, left for us a large enough arc which tells us the position of the centre and the length of the radius, and if we extend the arc on that basis it is nothing short of insane to accuse us of denying the wisdom of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan in describing a portion of the circle. It will be equally insane of us to think that we could describe the complete circle in our lifetime, and that anyone who would attempt after we are gone to extend the arc of progress as we left it would be denying the value of our life-work.

Well, however insane it may be, we have unfortunately a number of people among the Mussalmans of India who believe, or pretend to believe, in doctrines such as these which are the negation of all progress. Of Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab, at least, let us say we believe he does not merely pretend to believe in them but does believe in them. The heart is sound, but that does not alter the possibility of the head refusing to be an equally good guide.

It is not strange, then, that a man who was in his younger days of such advanced views as the respected editor of Al-Bashir should now on occasions lag considerably behind the times. The controversy about the Moslem University and the views of Al-Bashir on the subject provided one of the earliest indications of this failure to "grow", and few felt surprised at it. Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab is not now the familiar figure that he used to be at Aligarh, and it is to be presumed that he is not so much in touch with the affairs of the College, as he used to be before, taking too much for granted, and relying more than is safe on the peculiar views of his near kinsman, Dr. Zia-ud-Din. Politics was a comparatively less strong point of his at his best, and although he cannot satisfactorily account on the basis of his political beliefs for the annulment of the partition of Bengal, the rapprochement between the Local Government and the Congress School, as also between the Local Government and the Arya Samaj, and the policy of England towards Moslem nations and States, he is also unable to revise his political charita.

Naturally enough he is one of the few Mussalmans who have honest apprehensions that the Moslem League's recent amplification of its creed is a mistake. But the honest sceptic is a godsend to the confirmed hypocrite who works for his own ends under the cloak of patriotism and public duty. We are extremely hopeful of Moslem progress, for we see signs of it everywhere, though we do not consider every excitement to be movement, nor label every movement as progress. But we must confess to having some awful moments when the fears and doubts that assail us are those of a confirmed pessimist. And one of the chief causes of that pessimism is the young man whose "sobriety and sanity of judgment" is the common theme of every hypocrite in our bureaucracy who runs down the "young hot-heads." Such a person has none of the virtues of youth—the age that all old men sigh for—but most of the vices of old age. It makes a goblin of the sun to sit down quietly and picture what a calculating selfish old sinner he would be in his old age who is so calculating and selfish almost in adolescence. Well, the Mussalmans have some of these young-old gentlemen among them, and they see to it that each of them secures a rich or prominent or otherwise eligible puppet to dance to his wire-pulling. Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab is not exactly an eligible party for the purpose, but he is a useful enough cat-paw. He is, therefore, in great requisition, to-day at Cawnpore and to-morrow at Allahabad. The latest occasion on which the wires have been cleverly pulled is the "reconstitution" of the Etawah League, and we should like to know how Mr. Alay Nabi, who, we presume, is still the President of the Provincial League, views the impertinence of a twig—we cannot call a District League a "branch"—of the All-India Moslem League.

Our readers have heard something of the "three tailors of Tooley Street" in Lahore who assumed such imposing dignity in Mr. Shah's portentous resolution. But Etawah is not without its Tooley Street, and its Tooley Street is not without its three tailors. Etawah is a large town and has an important Moslem population. One would have thought, that when it took the important step of re-creating a District Moslem League, at least a couple of hundred Mussalmans would have met for the purpose. Particularly, when the old egg was laid a second time and took the still more serious step of cock-a-diddle-do-ing in opposition to the ancient chancery, immediately after it was laid again, and even before it was hatched, one would have thought that at least it took care to collect a goodly company in which to teach manners to its grandsire. But we regret to find that the grand meeting, advertised with the same neatness as Mr. Shah's, was attended, according to one account, by ten or twelve persons, and according to another by eight. Well, the figure of eight is a pretty figure, but is it really great enough to justify such silly chatter as that birching of the U. P. sphinx has published throughout India?

We are informed that Maulvi Said Ahmad Sahab who is a Municipal Commissioner and an Honorary Magistrate has been appointed the Secretary of the League. But it is said that he confesses he has no idea what the League is, nor the remotest notion whether it is or is not drifting towards the National Congress. It is our information that the figure of eight included two Mukhtars, one of whom is a relation of the editor of Al-Bashir, and two Hakims, one of whom is a paid servant of the Islamic School. We are entirely opposed to the view that a person employed in an educational institution must take no part in politics; but those whom the Etawah proceedings would gratify most hold that view strongly, and we hope Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab would let us and them know on which side his theory, if not practice, leans in this matter. The other Hakim, Mr. Bashir Ahmad, is said to have come from Hyderabad not long ago, and his views may be judged from the fact that he garlanded Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque, and was prominent in the collection of subscriptions for the Cawnpore Mosque Fund. He is reported to have opposed the famous Resolution along with two others, who were merchants, and it is stated that to meet this unforeseen contingency other gentlemen were brought to the meeting to give the framers of the Resolution a majority. Is it true that of the three Aligarh Graduates in Etawah who are not in Government service not one was invited to the meeting? Was any member of the late Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulka's family—one of the most important in Etawah—present at the meeting? We learn that efforts are being made in order that these wretched proceedings may be imitated elsewhere also. That is the reason why we think it best to expose the hollowness of what passed at Etawah. To be forewarned is to be forearmed, and we think the exposure we have made should be a sufficient warning.

We have hitherto had no reason to question the bona fides of the editor of Al-Bashir; but it is a little curious that in its issue of 2nd June, while much more than half the paper is filled with the translation of Mr. Alston's opening speech in the Delhi Conspiracy Case, (taken without any acknowledgement from the Hindustan) which Mr. Alston made on the 25th and 26th May, there is not the smallest report of the Etawah League's proceedings on the 29th May beyond an editorial note no more informing than the telegram sent to the papers.

(The self-forgetfulness is not without some reason, O Ghalib.

Something there must be that has to be draped.)

The editorial note says: "All the resolutions that the Etawah League has passed are the result of carefully and wisely keeping the benefit to the community in view. In particular the boldness and moral courage with which dissatisfaction with the present policy of the All-India Moslem League has been expressed is probably the first instance of its kind, and until and unless thinking Mussalmans do not give up this funky (dabbu) policy and declare their views 'freely there is an apprehension of great harm to the Mussalmans.'" The editor also tells us that the setting back of the clock by fifty years during the last two years has been the result of the silence of sagacious leaders, and it is therefore necessary that those who feel for the community and whose lives have been spent in thinking over the causes of national progress and decline should now display moral courage. In conclusion, he adds that he does not care for the abuse of a few selfish and short-sighted persons and believes it to be his duty to guide the community without fear.

Well, if the Etawah meeting is the result of Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din's efforts and the resolutions are his handiwork, we fear we shall have to withdraw even our one charge against him, that he has ceased to grow. We certainly never suspected him of such full-throated self-laudation, and, like Topsy, we 'spect he must have "grewed". The boldness and courage on which he prides himself can, from another point of view, be called insubordination and impertinence, and as such we are glad that it is the first instance of its kind. Is it too much to hope that it will also be the last?

But what astonishes us most is the denunciation of the "funky (dabbu) policy" of the All-India Moslem League. Can the much respected editor of Al-Bashir honestly affirm that that policy involves no risks for those who pursue it? How many bureaucrats can he point out who would not like to deport such Mussalmans as venture even to dream of self-government and to confiscate the printing presses and securities of such newspapers as support them? Not a hair of his beard has been in the least danger when the liberties of not the lives, of those with whom he disagrees have been in jeopardy. "Dabbu policy" indeed! The nearest approach that we ever saw to this dabbu policy was when Al-Bashir braved the wrath of a predecessor of Sir James Metton who was, if possible, a greater friend of those whom Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab regards as the enemies of Mussalmans. But, again, like Topsy, we 'spect the respected editor of Al-Bashir must have "grewed" from the "cowardice" of those days to the "courage" of these.

The hands of the clock have indeed been set back half a century, because in these few years the Indian Mussalmans have been induced to be generous to the extent of a good deal more than a crore for causes which Maulvi Bashir-ud-Din Sahab cannot deny he himself has had at heart, when a few years ago even a lakh was an impossible figure for Moslem generosity during the same period. But does he not know that those who gave so freely gave without the persuasion of the "sagacious leaders" whose silence he deploras. Some of these "sagacious leaders" have not scrupled even to offer prayers for their grandfathers' souls over the confectioners' shops, as the proverb has it. But it did not occur even to them to prevent their less "sagacious" co-religionists from offering their own hard-earned savings and even the bread of themselves and their children for the salvage of Islam after the bloody storm of the Balkans. Does Al-Bashir really believe that the croakings of these "sagacious leaders" would have stopped a shell from going to Turkey? The least that they could do was to remain silent, and for our part we consider that silence to have redeemed in a measure all their windy oratory indulged in at the bidding of the enemies of Islam.

Youth must wait and can afford to wait, for time is always on the side of the young. But how many of the aged Scribes and Pharisees can show "lives spent in thinking over the causes of national progress and decline"? Such of the old men as have spent themselves in this way are held in honour by the young far more than by their contemporaries, and it is a matter of pride and not of envy to the younger generation of Mussalmans that the man who leads them is not an unflinching briefless barrister who pulls the wires of puppets of all ages and types but an old man of seventy-three who knows not a word of English and on whom had fallen far more truly than on any else the mantle of Syed Ahmad Khan.

One word and we have done. Who are the youngmen that are now in the van? Are they not the lads of yesterday who sat at the feet of Syed Ahmad Khan and Theodore Beck during the best period of Aligarh's life-history? If they have gone wrong, who has misled them? Shall not Syed Ahmad Khan, Theodore Beck, Thomas Arnold and Theodore Morison have to answer for their wrong-doing? Mind you, it is not as if one man or a handful of men mislead the Moslem public. They are practically all of one mind and they are marching ahead shoulder to shoulder. If they are treading a dangerous path it was Syed Ahmad Khan that had led their footsteps thither. If they misguide the community the charge shall be laid at the red sandstone grave with the green grass under which sleeps the Sage of Aligarh. If it is out of the mouths of babes and sucklings that come forth words charged with the spirit of fire, remember, the lips are the lips of the young, but the voice is the voice of the old. Ah, for one Syed Ahmad Khan to-day to silence alike the old blabbers in their dotage and the young charlatans in their loud-proclaimed patriotism and loyalty.

III.—ISLAM AND JESUS CHRIST.

THE two previous articles that have appeared in this series must appear to our Moslem readers to have been wholly redundant, for they know that both the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr are journals owned and edited by Mussalmans, and religious Mussalmans at that, and no amount of Punjab Government notifications could convince any Mussalman that such journals could have permitted a syllable to be published in their columns even distantly suggestive of blasphemy or irreverence. But this presupposes a knowledge on their part of the teaching of the Quran on the subject of Jesus Christ and his birth, and evidently neither Sir Michael O'Dwyer nor the Marquess of Crewe know this. Let us therefore cite a few verses from the Quran to show how impossible it is for a Mussalman to write irreverently about Christ and the mother of Christ. Apart from numerous references throughout the Book, two Chapters of the Quran, the third, "The Family of Imran," and the nineteenth, "Mary", are in the main devoted to them. We invite the attention of the Punjab Government and the Secretary of State to the extracts from these two chapters which we give at the end of this article as an Appendix.

It must be remembered that before the Quran was revealed to the Prophet of Islam, there were two great bodies of men, the Christians and the Jews, who disputed among themselves about the birth of Christ. The Christians believed in the virginity of Mary, some going so far as to ascribe to her a perpetual virginity and even divinity. The Jews, on the other hand, cast aspersions on her chastity, and far from accepting the divinity of Jesus, branded him with bastardy. It was through Mohamed that God furnished Christianity with the most valuable evidence that could be secured, the independent testimony of divine revelation. In the Chapter on "Women" the Quran tells us that God had got ready "a grievous torment" for the Infidels among the Jews "for their having spoken against Mary a grievous calumny." In the Chapter on "Prophets" the Quran refers to Mary as "her who kept her maidenhood, and into whom we breathed of our spirit, and made her and her son a sign to all creatures." Again in the Chapter entitled "Forbidden" she is called "Mary, the daughter of Imran, who kept her maidenhood, and into whose womb we breathed of our spirit, and who believed in the words of her Lord and His Scriptures, and was one of the devout." Can any one believe after a perusal of the extracts given in the Appendix and of the extracts we have here given that a believing Mussalman could be irreverent towards Christ and slander Mary?

The Quran, however, repudiated the divinity of Jesus Christ in no mistakeable terms. "It becometh not a man," says the Quran, "that God should give him the Scriptures and the wisdom, and the gift of prophecy, and that he should say to his followers 'Be ye worshippers of me as well as of God': but rather, 'Be ye perfect in things pertaining to God, since ye know the Scriptures and have studied deep.'" ("The Family of Imran.") "It becometh not God to beget a son. Glory be to Him! when he decreeth a thing. He only saith to it, Be, and it is." "They say: 'The God of Mercy hath gotten offspring.' Now have ye done a monstrous thing! Almost might the very Heavens be rent thereat, and the Earth cleave asunder, the mountains fall down in fragments. That they ascribe a son to the God of Mercy, when it becometh not the God of Mercy to beget a son. Verily there "is none in the Heavens, and in the Earth but shall approach the God of Mercy as a servant." ("Mary.") "Infidels now are they who say 'God is the Messiah, son of Mary'; for the Messiah said, 'O children of Israel! worship God, my Lord and your Lord.' Whoever shall join other gods with God, God shall forbid him the Garden, and his abode shall be the Fire; and the wicked shall have no helpers. They surely are Infidels who say, 'God is the third of three': for there is no god but one God: and if they refrain not from what they say, a grievous chastisement shall light on such of them as are Infidels. . . . The Messiah, son of Mary, is but an Apostle; other Apostles have flourished before him; and his mother was a just person: they both ate food. Behold! how we make clear to them the signs! then behold how they turn aside! And when God shall say—'O Jesus, son of Mary: hast thou said unto mankind, 'Take me and my mother as two Gods beside God?' He shall say—'Glory be unto Thee! It is not for me to say that which I know to be not the truth.'" ("The Table.") "And that it may warn those who say, 'God hath begotten a son'. No knowledge of this have either they or their fathers! A grievous saying to come out of their mouths. They speak no other than a lie." ("The Cave.") "Say, He is God alone: God the Eternal! He begetteth not, and He is not begotten; And there is none like unto Him." ("The Unity.") (The translation in each case is Rodwell's.)

We can well believe that a Mussalman may occasionally lose his temper and abuse those who preach the divinity of Christ; but after a perusal of these copious references in the Quran who can even conceive that a Mussalman could ever publish anything "wantonly scurrilous and offensive" about the birth of Christ and the purity of Mary? Is it not a pity that neither the Minister responsible to the King and People of Great Britain for the good government of India, wherein reside seventy million Mussalmans, nor the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, where more than half the population is Moslem, knows enough of a small book called the Quran to believe that a Mussalman is incapable of wanton scurrility and offensiveness where Mary and Jesus Christ are concerned?

In spite of the universal reverence for the late Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, the founder of Aligarh and the dictator of Moslem India in politics as well as education, even to-day the majority of the Mussalmans of India look askance at his sane rationalism in religion. It is true that even in the domain of religion his influence has been extraordinarily great, that not only are the young Mussalmans for the most part his enthusiastic disciples, but that men of the older generation also are now getting reconciled to his rationalism since it has been echoed from Syria and Egypt as the views of men like Mufti Mohamed Abdu expressed in a language held sacred because it is the language of the Quran. But when a young disciple of Sir Syed Ahmad who is an Old Boy of Aligarh complained in the course of a laudatory speech on the Founder's Day that his religious works were still taboo at the College which he had founded, and urged their inclusion in the Divinity syllabus at Aligarh, Nawab Vihar-ul-Mulk, the friend and successor of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, replied that it was too early yet for the generality of Mussalmans to be reconciled to all his teachings, and the one view of Syed Ahmed Khan that he selected for mention in support of his contention, which he felt sure few even in that gathering could permit to be taught at Aligarh, was his view of the birth of Christ. The generality of Mussalmans could not yet regard the ascription of Christ's paternity to Joseph the Carpenter as otherwise than derogatory to Christ. The writer in the An-Najm, whom the Badr quotes so fully, only attempted to meet the objections of the "Naturalists" by seeking to prove an alternative hypothesis equally "natural," namely, the birth of Christ from the virgin womb of a hermaphrodite. Such is the habit of mind of Mussalmans in discussing the birth of Christ, and yet the Secretary of State can believe that Mussalmans who regard as irreverent even the views of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, of whom at least no one has yet said that he brought the Christian population of India into contempt, are capable of writing any thing "wantonly scurrilous and offensive."

IV.—RESTRAINT OF PROSELYTIZATION.

WHATEVER we have said hitherto may or may not benefit the two journals from which security has been demanded without any justification. But our object in writing this series of articles is, as the title must have made clear, to draw the attention of the Government to a most serious aspect of the question. Is the Press Act to prevent the proselytization of Christians by Moslem missionaries, or, for the matter of that, of people of any faith by the missionaries of another? Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din Sahab has already drawn the attention of the Secretary of State to this question, and we should have thought that his Open Letter to Lord Crewe would be enough. But the reply given by Mr. Charles Roberts to Mr. Morrell clearly shows that the question must be dinned into official ears for a long time before any effect can be assured.

Let us examine the general question with reference to the case of these two journals. In the first place, as we have clearly shown, a Mussalman cannot even think evil of Jesus Christ and Mary and remain a Mussalman. In the second place, the two journals with which we have dealt at length published nothing about them that was in the least irreverent. But, in the third place, if they did, how can the Christian population of the Province be brought into contempt by the publication of any thing which blasphemes Jesus Christ or is irreverent in dealing with the question of his birth? If such publication is a criminal offence, the Indian Penal Code must have provided suitable punishment for it in Chapter XV entitled "Of Offences relating to Religion." This consists of four sections only. Section 295 deals with the injuring or defiling of a place of worship or any object held sacred by any class of persons, with intent to insult their religion or with the knowledge that they are likely to consider such an act an insult to their religion. Obviously this section applies to conduct such as that of Mr. Tyler at Cawnpore, and not of the Ahl-i-Hadees or the Badr. Section 296 deals with the offence of disturbing a religious assembly, and the two Punjab journals did not even disturb an assembly of Christians rebuilding a Church forcibly destroyed by Mussalmans as Mr. Tyler did. Section 297, again, is wholly inapplicable, relates to trespassing on burial places et cetera. The last remaining section in this Chapter is 298, and the offence of the peccant papers must be found set forth here, if anywhere, because it deals with the offence of wounding the religious feelings of persons.

But let us examine the section. It says: "Whoever, with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of any person, utters any word or makes any sound in the hearing of that person, or makes any gesture in the sight of that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both." That is all. It is an offence to utter any word or make any sound in the hearing of a person or make a gesture in his sight with the deliberate intention of wounding his feelings. But if a writer writes anything even with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of any person he does not commit any offence under this section. It is clear that the essence of the offence under section 298 is that it should be committed in the hearing or the sight of the person whose religious feelings are intended to be deliberately wounded. Such an offence is provocative of an instantaneous breach of the peace which wantonly scurrilous and offensive writing, where the provocation, however grave, is not sudden, is not supposed to be. Whether scurrilous and offensive writing with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of a person or a class should or should not be regarded as a penal offence is not the question. We strongly believe that it should be, and we are sorry that it is not; but as things stand we can only conclude that the framers of the Indian Penal Code omitted it of a set purpose.

It is true that the comparatively recently enacted section 153A makes it an offence to promote or attempt to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects by words, whether written or spoken, or by visible representation, or in any other manner. But, in the first place, the explanation to this section makes it clear that it does not amount to an offence within the meaning of this section to point out, without malicious intention and with an honest view to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects. Thus, even if it be supposed that the belief in or the repudiation of the Immaculate Conception or the doctrine of Atonement is producing, or has a tendency to produce, feelings of enmity and hatred between Christians and non-Christians, the explanation makes it clear that if a Christian honestly intends to remove the non-Christian disbelief and a non-Christian equally honestly intends to remove the Christian belief, neither of them is guilty of an offence under this section. In the second place, the section deals with feelings of hatred and enmity between different classes which are obviously productive of much evil to the people and of much embarrassment to the State. It does not deal with the wounding of the religious feelings of an individual by another individual or even of a class by an individual. We can well understand that the Jewish assertion that Christ was the offspring of an illicit union would wound the religious feelings of Christians and Mussalmans, and if a Jewish preacher called Christ a bastard in the hearing of a Christian or a Mussalman, with the deliberate intention of wounding his religious feelings, a prosecution could rightly be instituted under section 298. But if a Jew wrote—and thousands have written—expressing disbelief in the Immaculate Conception, and accusing Mary, as they did more than nineteen hundred years ago when they said: "O Mary! Now thou hast done a strange thing! O sister of Aaron! Thy father was 'not a man of wickedness, nor unchaste thy mother,'" no Christian or Mussalman could successfully prosecute him in any Criminal Court in British India. If it is not an offence under Chapter XV relating to Religion, as it is not, it can not be one under Chapter VIII relating to Public Tranquillity either.

Assuming that such writings are calculated to disturb public tranquillity, they would do so because the person or class of persons whose religious feelings are wounded learns thereby to hate the writer or the class to which the writer belongs. Let us now apply this to the cases of the Ahl-i-Hadees and Badr. What their peccant articles may have done is this. They may have persuaded the Christian population of the Province, including its Christian officials, to hate the Mussalmans. In other words, they may have brought the Moslem population of the Province into hatred. But to say that they have brought the Christian population of the Province into contempt is to reverse the truth and to play with words. The belief that a Local Government can stoop to such things is certainly likely to bring the Local Government into contempt. But obviously the responsibility for that lies at the door of that Local Government and not at the door of a writer who would earnestly dissuade it from courses which, if deliberate, can only be characterised, in the words of Sir Edward Carson, as hypocritical shams.

We have dealt with the law, certainly as it existed before the Press Act, and most probably as it exists even after that inane piece of legislation. But if the opinion of the Punjab Government is correct, then we must say proselytization and the Press Act cannot go together. The one contradicts and prevents the other. By religious freedom a missionary religion such as Islam or Christianity understands not only freedom to believe in one's faith but also freedom to persuade others also to believe in it. As Prof. Max Müller defined it, a missionary religion is one "in which the spreading of the truth and the conversion of unbelievers are raised to the rank of a sacred duty by the founder or his immediate successors." It is the spirit of truth in the hearts of believers which cannot rest, unless it manifests itself in thought, word and deed, which is not satisfied till it has carried its message to every human soul, till what it believes to be the truth is accepted as the truth by all members of the human family." The question is, shall Government tolerate the performance of this "sacred duty" any longer in India? Shall the restless spirit of truth in the heart of believers be permitted any more to manifest itself in thought, word and deed? Shall it be still allowed to seek satisfaction by carrying its message to every human soul, till the truth is accepted by all members of the human family? If the answer is 'Yes,' then in God's name say it clearly and without mental reservations, and when you have done that we shall see to it that you do not depart from your pledged word. But if the answer is 'No,' then too, in God's name say it clearly and tear up the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, for it will certainly bring you into the contempt that nowadays you so much, and for such good reasons, dread. So long as that charter of our liberties exists, and every subject of the Emperor has religious freedom, we absolutely deny the right of any administrator, be he Lieutenant-Governor of a Province, Governor of a Presidency or Governor-General of the whole of India, to prohibit any man, whatever his faith, to do his utmost to obtain, with the weapons of the mind, victory for his own peculiar opinions. Grant the existence of such a right and you nullify the power of the Punjab Government and the potency of the Press Act to prevent any person from bringing Christianity or Islam or Brahminism into contempt. It is no crime so far as the Criminal Law of India is concerned to bring even a Christian into contempt, and every Anglo-Indian newspaper is every day attempting to bring every community of India into contempt. A very large section of India's public servants of European and Eurasian extraction has openly made lying statements before the Public Service Commission calculated to bring Indians into contempt, and not as much as a Secretariat mouse has stirred in his official hole. But let that pass. The Press Act will not permit any class or section of His Majesty's subjects to be brought into contempt, even if it be the contempt of a solitary individual, and that too a foreigner living in the antipodes. As the judgment in our Pamphlet Case says, it will not permit even "that degraded section of the public which lives on the misery and shame of others" to be brought into contempt. But can any Act prevent, not Christians or Mussalmans or Brahmins, but Christianity or Islam or Brahminism from being brought into contempt without the legislators driving a coach and six through the Queen's Proclamation?

Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din Sahib has put the matter so well in his open letter that we need offer no apology for reproducing a long extract from it. He wrote:

Will your lordship think of those psychological moments when one renounces the religion one is born in and embraces a new faith; analyse those mental conditions which actuate a person to cut himself off from his kin and kindred. Can anyone hazard such a step unless and until he is disgusted with the religion he inherits from his parents? Religion is a most precious thing with man. Even those among us who are most liberal-minded in other matters of opinion, are prone to show a strong conservatism in their adhesion to their faith. We are all attached to our respective creeds, and one who attempts to wean us from it must first create hatred in our mind towards it. Conversion in religion, therefore, my lord, can only mean the turning of attachment into abhorrence. In plain speech, it is to create this disgust and abhorrence against other religions and their adherents which every missionary effort tends to. Preachers may differ according to their taste and culture in the means they adopt in creating this state of feeling in the minds of their would-be converts, but the object is always the same. Except to create abhorrence, contempt and disgust against Moslems and their religion, what can be the object of the Christian missionaries, in so far as the West to convert us to the Western persuasion, in reviling our religion and its Holy Founder? For full fifty years the most virulent literature has come from Christian pens. Our Holy Prophet and his teachings have been made the victim of a baseless calumny and shameless abusive remarks. We know for certain that these teachers of Christian charity and meekness have no personal grudge against the Moslems and the Holy Prophet. They are sent to convert non-Christians to their faith. It is their business, therefore, to create hatred and contempt against Islam in Moslem and non-Moslem minds, as without that they cannot secure the object for which they are subsidised by the Christian Nations in the West. A Moslem missionary must do the same and try to attain the same object, though in a gentlemanly way, as he cannot resort to abuses and calumnies under the clear injunctions of the Quran, which lays a particular obligation on the Moslems to show a thoroughly respectful attitude towards the leaders of other religious communities.

The Khwaja Sahib makes his position impregnable by recalling to the mind of the Secretary of State the attitude and policy of the Punjab Government in the past. Let us retrace our steps and go back from Sir Michael O'Dwyer to Sir Mackworth Young. It was in 1897 or 1898 when the Mussalmans of the Punjab approached the then Lieutenant-Governor through the Anjuman-i-Himayet-i-Islam with a request that preventive action should be taken in connection with the publication of a book named Ummahat-ul-Mominen ("Mothers of Mussalmans") written by a Christian missionary, which surpassed other Christian publications in India in its wanton scurrility and offensiveness. Even Sir Syed Ahmad Khan was moved to prepare a rejoinder. It was the last work on which that great man was engaged, but unfortunately he died before he could finish it. And what did the Lieutenant-Governor say? He declined to accede to the wishes of the Moslem population of the Punjab because he thought that interference in such a matter would have amounted to an interference with the freedom of religious opinion and its expression, a privilege of His Majesty's Indian subjects under the Proclamation of 1858. The Ishat-i-Kuffara is no better, but neither the Secretary of State, nor we, know whether the Punjab Government has done anything to punish its author, the pastor of the Church of England, or to proscribe the book. Probably the hitch in the way is still the freedom of religious opinion and its expression, the privilege of the Indian subject under the Proclamation of 1858! But notwithstanding all the privileges and proclamations in the world, the articles of the Ahl-i-Hadice and the Badr are, in the opinion of the Local Government of the Punjab, calculated to bring the Christian population of the province into contempt. Between His Honour Sir Mackworth Young and His Honour Sir Michael O'Dwyer what a strange analogy and what a still more strange contrast!

APPENDIX.

In the Chapter entitled "The Family of Imran" the Quran says:—

Remember when the wife of Imran said, "O my Lord! I vow to thee what is in my womb, for thy special service. Accept it from me, for thou hearest, knowest!" And when she had given birth to it, she said, "O my Lord! verily I have brought forth a female."—(God knew what she had brought forth; a male is not as a female)—"and I have named her Mary, and I take refuge with thee for her and for her offspring, from Satan the stoned."

So with goodly acceptance did her Lord accept her, and with goodly growth did he make her grow. Zacharias reared her. So oft as Zacharias went in to Mary at the sanctuary, he found her supplied with food. "Oh, Mary!" said he, "whence hast thou this?" She said, "It is from God: for God supplieth whom He will, without reckoning!" There did Zacharias call his Lord: "O my Lord!" said he, "vouchsafe me from thyself good descendants, for thou art the hearer of prayer." Then did the angels call to him, as he stood praying in the sanctuary:

"God announceth John (Yahia) to thee, who shall be verifier of the word from God, and a great one, chaste, and a prophet of the number of the just."

He said, "O my Lord! how shall I have a son, now that old age hath come upon me, and my wife is barren?" He said, "Thus will God do His pleasure."

He said, "Lord! give me a token." He said, "Thy token shall be, that for three days thou shalt speak to no man but by signs: But remember thy Lord often, and praise Him as even and at morn."

And remember when the angels said, "O Mary! Verily hath God chosen thee, and purified thee, and chosen thee above the women of the world!"

O Mary! be devout towards thy Lord, and prostrate thyself, and bow down with those who bow."

This is one of the announcements of things unseen by thee! To thee, O Muhammad! do we reveal it; for thou wast not with them when they cast lots with reeds which of them should rear Mary; nor wast thou with them when they disputed about it.

Remember when the angel said, "O Mary! verily God! announceth to thee the Word from Him: His name shall be, Messiah Jesus the son of Mary, illustrious in this world, and in the next, and one of those who have near access to God,"

And He shall speak to men alike when in the cradle and when grown up; And he shall be one of the just."

She said, "How, O my Lord! Shall I have a son, when man hath not touched me?" He said, "Thus: God will create what he will; when He decreeth a thing, He only saith, 'Be,' and it is."

And he will teach him the Book, and the Wisdom, and the Law, and the Evangel; and he shall be an apostle to the children of Israel. "Now have I come," he will say, "to you with a sign from your Lord: Out of clay will I make for you, as it were, the figure of a bird; and I will breathe into it, and it shall become, by God's leave, a bird. And I will heal the blind, and the leper; and by God's leave will I quicken the dead; and I will tell you what ye eat, and what ye store up in your houses! Truly in this will be a sign for you, if ye are believers."

And I have come to attest the law which was before me; and to allow you part of that which had been forbidden you; and I come to you with a sign from your Lord: Fear God, then, and obey me; of a truth God is my Lord, and your Lord: Therefore worship Him. This is a right way."

And when Jesus perceived unbelief on their part, He said, "Who my helpers with God?" The apostles said, "We will be God's helpers! We believe in God, and hear thou witness that we are Muslims."

O our Lord! We believe in what thou hast sent down, and we follow the apostle; write us up, then, with those who bear witness to him."

And the Jews plotted, and God plotted: But of those who plot is God the best.

Remember when God said, "O Jesus! verily I will cause thee to die, and will take thee up to myself and deliver thee from those who believe not; and I will place those who follow thee above those who believe not, until the day of resurrection. Then, to me is your return, and wherein ye differ will I decide between you."

And as to those who believe not, I will chastise them with a terrible chastisement in this world and in the next; and none shall they have to help them."

But as to those who believe, and do the things that are right, He will pay them with recompense. God loveth not the doers of evil.

These signs, and this wise warning do we rehearse to thee. Verily, Jesus is as Adam in the sight of God. He created him of dust:

He then said to him, "Be!"—and he was.

The truth from thy Lord! Be not thou, therefore, of those who doubt.

The Chapter "Mary" contains some more details. After "a recital of thy Lord's mercy to his servant Zachariah", who prayed for an heir and successor, and praise of Yahia (John), the son born to him in spite of his wife's barrenness and his old age, on whom were bestowed "wisdom, while yet a child; and mercifulness from Ourselves, and purity," and who is stated to have been "pious, dutious to his parents; and not proud, rebellious," the Quran goes on to say:

And make mention in the Book, of Mary, when she went apart from her family, eastward,

And took a veil to shroud herself from them: and we sent our spirit to her, and he took before her the form of a perfect man.

She said: "I fly for refuge from thee to the God of Mercy! If thou fearest Him, begone from me."

He said: "I am only a messenger of thy Lord, that I may bestow on thee a holy son."

She said: "How shall I have a son, when man hath never touched me? and I am not unchaste."

He said: "So shall it be. Thy Lord hath said: 'Easy is this with me; and we will make him a sign to mankind, and a mercy from us. For it is a thing decreed.'

And she conceived him, and retired with him to a far-off place.

And the throes came upon her by the trunk of a palm: She said: "Oh, would that I had died ere this, and been a thing forgotten, forgotten quite!"

And one cried to her from below her: "Grieve not thou, the Lord hath provided a streamlet at thy feet:—

And shake the trunk of the palm free toward thee: it will drop fresh ripe dates upon thee.

Eat then and drink, and be of cheerful eye: and shouldst thou see a man,

Say:—Verily, I have vowed abstinence to the God of mercy.—To no one will I speak this day."

Then came she with the babe to her people, bearing him. They said, "O Mary! now hast thou done a strange thing!"

O sister of Aaron! Thy father was not a man of wickedness, nor unchaste thy mother."

And she made a sign to them, pointing towards the babe. They said, "How shall we speak with him who is in the cradle, an infant?"

It said, "Verily, I am the servant of God; He hath given me the Book, and He hath made me a prophet;

And he hath made me blessed wherever I may be, and hath enjoined me prayer and almsgiving so long as I shall live;

And to be dutious to her that bare me; and he hath not made me proud, depraved."

And the peace of God was on me the day I was born, and will be the day I shall die, and the day I shall be raised to life."

This is Jesus, the son of Mary; this is a statement of the truth concerning which they doubt.—(Rodwell's Translation.)

Verse.

On Reading the History of Napoleon.

I ask of Heaven nor regal pomp nor power;
Nor conquered realms subservient to my will;

Nor vassal kings, with vassal hordes, to fill
My yawning coffers with a gorgeous shower

Of gold and gems; nor legions that devour
Fair Nature's bounty and, insatiate still,

Prey on her heart and, with the blood they spill
Pollute God's Earth and blast Life's fruit and flower.

I ask of Heaven that purer, holier pride
Which soars above the blood-stained pomp of kings;

A soul contented, whose unerring guide
Is that divine Philosophy which flings

The radiant garb of Truth and Beauty wide

(SPECIAL REPORT FOR "INDIA.")

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN yesterday (May 14.) entertained to breakfast at the Westminster Place Hotel a number of members of both Houses of Parliament and other public men to welcome the delegates appointed by the Indian National Congress to represent their views in this country. Besides the delegates (Mr. Mahomed Ali Jinnah, Mr. N. M. Samarth, the Hon. Mr. B. N. Sarma, Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque, and Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha), the following had accepted Sir William's invitation:—Lord Courtney of Penwith, Lord Kinnaird, Lord Reay, Mirza Abbas Ali Baig, O.S.I.; Sir George Birdwood, K.C.I.E.; Sir M. M. Bhowmaggree, K.C.I.E.; Sir Edward Boyle, Bart.; Mr. F. H. Brown, Mr. Herbert Burrows, Sir Henry Cotton, K.C.S.I.; Mr. H. E. A. Cotton, L.C.C.; Mr. A. L. Cotton, Mr. E. Dalgado, Mr. Samuel Digby, C.I.E.; Mr. Bhagwandin Dube, Mr. G. P. Gooch, Mr. J. Fredk. Green, Mr. Frederick Grubb, Sir Krishna Gupta, K.C.S.I.; Mr. W. Douglas Hall, Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P.; Sir John Jardine, K.C.I.E., M.P.; Mr. Leif Jones, M.P.; Mr. Joseph King, M.P.; Mr. A. C. Morton, M.P.; Mr. Philip Morrell, M.P.; Dr. A. F. Murison, Mr. H. W. Nevinnson, Mr. Harry Nuttall, M.P.; Mr. C. J. O'Donnell, Dr. John Pollen, C.I.E.; Mr. J. B. Pennington, Mr. J. M. Parikh, Mr. Mark Phillips Price, Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe, Sir Herbert Roberts, Bart, M.P.; Dr. V. H. Rutherford, Sir George Scott Robertson, K.C.S.I., M.P.; Hon. Mr. Krishna Sahai, Major N. P. Sinha, I.M.S. (retired), Mr. Harold Spender, Right Hon. Sir Charles Swann, Bart., M. P.; Mr. S. H. Swinny, Mr. A. MacCallum Scott, M.P.; Mr. Theodore Taylor, M.P.; Col. Warlicker I.M.S. (retired); Mr. Sidney Webb, and Mr. J. C. Wedgwood, M.P.

Letters expressing regret were received from the Bishop of Lincoln, Lord Channing, Lord Weardale, Dr. C. Addison, M.P.; Mr. Percy Aldon, M.P.; the Right Hon. Amir Ali, Mr. Edwyn Bevan, Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, Mr. Annan Bryce, M.P.; the Right Hon. Thomas Burt, M.P.; Sir William Byles, M.P.; Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P.; Dr. John Clifford, Mr. G. G. Greenwood, M.P.; Mr. T. Hart-Davies, Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P.; Mr. Gordon Hewart, K.C., M.P.; Mr. Frederic Harrison, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. Bernard Houghton, Sir Robert Laidlaw, the Right Hon. Thos. Lough, M. P.; Mr. F. C. Mackarness, Sir Theodore Morison, K.C.I.E.; Mr. P. A. Molteno, M.P.; Mr. Vaughan Nash, C.B.; Mr. Ernest Parke, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, M.P.; Right Hon. G. W. J. Russell, Mr. G. P. Scott, Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P.; Mr. Fisher Unwin, Mr. John Ward, M.P.; the Right Hon. Eugene Wason, M.P.; and Mr. A. J. Wilson.

Dr. Clifford wrote that he regarded the meeting of "manifest importance to our empire in India and at home, and certain to promote the best interest of our people there and here."

Mr. A. J. Wilson wrote: "Circumstances have compelled me of late years to give less space to Indian affairs in the 'Investors' Review,' but I have lost none of my interest in the Indian peoples or in their advancement in the paths of freedom. These many years past I have held and preached the doctrine that if the British Empire is to endure, to outlast other empires which have come and gone, it can only do so by emancipating the nations over whose destinies it holds sway, by guiding and educating them until they can take control of their own affairs. The process is long, the progress often slow, but I think we are now on the right path in India. Patience and a wise restraint will bring India to the goal. Pray convey my regrets and most hearty greetings to Sir William Wedderburn, the faithful, consistent and life-long champion of the peoples of India."

Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., wrote: "I have no personal acquaintance with Indian questions, but I read India, and try to keep in touch with Congress aims and ideals, which seem to me altogether moderate, progressive, and of such a character that, as a Liberal, I cannot help sympathising with them. It seems to me that if we are to retain the loyalty and affection of India we must apply the same principles there as have proved so successful elsewhere, and by due extension (cautious and gradual, of course), of local autonomy on representative lines, put responsibility upon the people, and open up to them an avenue for self-help and self-improvement, along the lines of their own development, which need not be identical with English ideas, though they will need English sympathy, help and, to some extent, direction."

Mr. E. S. Montagu, M.P., who had been expected, wrote subsequently to say that on arrival at the Treasury that morning he had discovered that he had mistaken the day on which he was looking forward to meet the Congress delegates. He could only plead that it was essential during the passage of the Finance Bill through the House of Commons for him to make at the shortest notice unavoidable engagements of a business kind. He trusted that Sir William Wedderburn would accept his apologies, and hoped to find some other opportunity of meeting the delegates, for he was deeply sensible of the many kindnesses shown to him by members of the Congress when he was in India, and he still retained undiminished his interest in Indian affairs.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN'S SPEECH.

Sir William Wedderburn, rising immediately after breakfast, said: The object of our meeting to-day is to promote an Entente Cordiale. We have been hearing much lately of the Entente Cordiale with France and Germany. That is all excellent. But I say that it is still more important that we should have an Entente Cordiale with India. Rightly understood, the interests of India and of this country are identical. If there has been unrest in India, it has proceeded from misunderstanding, and the object of the delegates is to remove that misunderstanding, and to substitute a good understanding—in every sense of the word. Our desire is to establish an atmosphere of sympathy and brotherly kindness between the two great branches of the Aryan race. The delegates have come duly accredited by the Indian National Congress, which for the last thirty years has voiced the needs and aspirations of the Indian people. They are all gentlemen of recognised position in the public life of India. Three of them are barristers of your Inns of Court, and have had the honour of sitting in the Legislative Council of the Viceroy, Lord Hardinge, to whom India owes so much. The fourth is a member of the Madras Legislative Council, and the fifth is a Vakil of the High Court of Bombay and hon. secretary of the Bombay Presidency Association. Three are Hindus, and two are Moslems. Our time to-day is short, and I am not going to take it up with a speech. What is wanted is that you should hear about India at first hand from Indians themselves. For this purpose I propose that we should resolve ourselves into a Conference. Over this Conference Lord Courtney has most kindly consented to preside. In this we are very fortunate, for he is the best chairman in England. I will now ask him to be so good as to take the chair.

LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH.

Lord Courtney then took the chair. They were assembled (he said) to listen to delegates who had come over from India, mainly, as he understood, in response to an invitation sent by Lord Crewe in view of the intention he had arrived at of revising and amending the Constitution of his Council. Lord Crewe had asked that those who were interested in the matter should communicate their ideas to him. That was a very unusual step on the part of the head of a great Department, and he thought they ought to congratulate Lord Crewe upon his audacity. He hoped they would later on be able to congratulate him on his success. In India the invitation had been taken up very cordially, and they had present that day five gentlemen who would convey to them the opinions of the great mass of educated people in India.

MR. MAHOMED ALI JINNAH.

Mr. Jinnah said that Lord Crewe had in contemplation a Bill which was intended to reform the India Council—which was really the head of the Government of India and the highest tribunal in all matters executive. It had created a most satisfactory impression in India that an opportunity for stating their views should be given to them by the Government before the Bill was introduced into the British Parliament. At the present moment the India Council was composed of ten members. Two were financial experts, and the rest, who were nominated by the Secretary of State, were connected with the administration of India. Although Lord Morley very recently recognised that anybody who could give first-hand information on Indian matters to his Council would prove very desirable member of that body, and although he gave effect to that view by appointing two Indian members, those two gentlemen were nominated members only, and while they had done excellent work, and had tried, to the best of their ability and judgment, to place the views of the Indian people before the Council, yet something more was desired. It was necessary that the Secretary of State should be kept in intimate touch with the trend of public opinion in India. Men who were connected with the administration, and were brought up in the Service, were debarred by virtue of the rules of that very Service from attending political meetings, and thereby obtaining the clear insight which was necessary for them to adequately represent India opinion. Representatives were required who had been, so to speak, behind the scenes, and men who had been brought up solely in the administrative groove. They wanted on the Council men in touch with public feeling and acquainted with public sentiment and public opinion; and therefore in a position to put before the Secretary of State views which men

The complainant begs to state as follows:—

1. The accused has been exhibiting this week moving pictures according to the accompanying programme.

2. That one item of the programme is entitled "Azim".

3. That on the night of the 4th instant the complainant went to the picture palace to see the show where he saw the film "Azim". The Holy Prophet (Mohamed) falls in love with one Salika, the beautiful wife of Azim, one of the Prophet's generals. The Holy Prophet sends Azim to the wars with a view to secure his wife Salika. Azim bids farewell to Salika and goes to the wars. The Holy Prophet sends one of his slaves to Salika to bear false news that her husband Azim had been killed in battle. The Holy Prophet then sends women to console Salika and shortly afterwards he himself goes to her and tells Salika "Come to me; I shall console you in your sorrow". Under this pretext he takes Salika to his Harem and conjures up the ghost of Azim. The Holy Prophet then makes immodest advances and offers her a necklace which she refuses. He further asks her to submit to his passion which she refuses to do. Azim happens to return and is informed that his wife is missing. He learns she is with the Holy Prophet. He then goes to Him who tells him Salika is dead and tries to console him. The Holy Prophet then produces a number of beautiful women and asks Azim to choose one as his wife. He refuses and goes home inconsolable. Near his house Azim receives news that Salika is alive and in the hands of the Holy Prophet. He goes to the Holy Prophet's Harem in a rage armed with a sword to rescue Salika. The Holy Prophet hides himself and tries to induce Salika to drink poison. This she will not do. Azim sees the Holy Prophet offering the poison to Salika. The Holy Prophet runs away and his slaves manacle and imprison Azim who manages to escape with Salika and leaves the country for good.

4. Such an exhibition is repugnant to the religious feelings of all Mohamedans. A representation of the Holy Prophet engaged even in his most holy work would shock Mohamedans susceptibilities. The portrayal of him engaged in base and wicked intrigue is an outrageous sacrilege.

5. Many Mohamedans present voiced their indignation but no heed was paid to them. The exhibition has excited the feelings of hundreds of Mohamedans, and unless an immediate stop is put to it there will certainly be riot and bloodshed. A Pir who was present was with difficulty restrained from cabling to the Turkish Consul. The accused has clearly committed an offence under section 298 I. P. C. and it is prayed that he may be dealt with according to law.

Application under section 144 Cr. P. C.

The applicant prays that this Honourable Court will be pleased under section 144 C.P.C. to issue a written order to be served upon the opponent directing the opponent to abstain from exhibiting at the Picture Palace or elsewhere in moving pictures "Azim" on the following ground:—

1. That the applicant this day has filed a criminal complaint showing that the said film depicts the Holy Prophet as engaged in a vulgar and base intrigue with a married woman. The exhibition had already deeply wounded the feelings of hundreds of the followers of the Holy Prophet and unless immediate steps are taken to prohibit any further representation there is sure to be riot and bloodshed.

2. The objectionable nature of the exhibition has been set forth in the complaint. Several hundreds of Mahomedans were in conclave this morning and it was with difficulty that they were restrained by Mr. Nabi Bux, the head of the community, to keep within the law. The more hot-headed of them wished to march upon the theatre and raze it to the ground.

3. The cause of the recent Cawnpore riots was nothing compared with this sacrilegious exhibition.

4. That an exhibition will take place again at 7 p. m. this evening. It is submitted that this is a matter of the utmost emergency. Unless an order is passed under section 144 (2) C.P.C. it is feared there will be bloodshed to-night.

connected with the Service could not possibly do. How were they to secure representatives of that character? Their suggestion was that the only possible way was to introduce the principle of election. Once they got elected members on the Council, they would have representatives who would be responsible for the people of India, and who would not secure re-election if their work had not proved satisfactory. The proposal he had first to submit was that the Council should consist of a minimum number of nine members—one-third of whom should be elected Indians. The principle of election had already been recognised over and over again in regard to this Council. More than one attempt had been made to reform it, and on every occasion the principle of election had been recognised; but the difficulty was to form the electorate. He quite agreed that that presented great difficulty in times gone by, but to-day they had already got an electorate in India which had been working for a number of years. He could best illustrate it by describing what occurred in the Presidencies of Bombay, Madras, or Bengal—which sent their representatives to the Imperial Council. In Bombay they had got non-official members of the local legislative Council, and they were entitled to send three representatives to the Imperial Council. In the last two elections that had taken place under the new Council Act, and even before, they had chosen their representatives in Bombay to the Imperial Council in this way. The non-official members of the local Council elected those whom they sent to the Imperial Council. Thus they had a ready-made electorate in the elected members of the provincial Councils. Those elected members could choose the members to represent them on the Imperial Council. He thought that would prove a most satisfactory electorate. It would secure the choice of really representative men. The system had already obtained a certificate from eminent official in India, like Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson, and the late and the present Viceroy. As to the character of the Council, his suggestion was that it should be Advisory and not Administrative. It had been given out that the portfolio system was to be introduced. He thought that would be fatal and dangerous. It would mean duplicating the machinery and reducing the Secretary of State to a mere figurehead. If each man was to be placed in charge of a portfolio, and if he was to be necessarily connected with the administration, it would mean that a man who had retired from the Service in India would be called upon to dispose of matters which were the subject of complaint against the very class from which he was drawn. Hitherto, the Secretary of State had not only dealt with matters of detail, but also with matters of principle and policy. It was in the fitness of things that there should be antagonism between the official and the non-official views on these questions—questions, for instance, such as the separation of the executive from the judiciary—or the extension of elementary education, or the Press Act. The Secretary of State, consequently, when these matters came before him would be unable to hear both sides of the question if he had nothing but the official element surrounding him. They wanted the Secretary of State to be made the real master of the situation. They wanted him to be placed in possession of the real facts on both sides. Of course, ultimately, the decision rested with him. The full Council, as they knew, might come to a unanimous conclusion on a particular subject which the Secretary of State might not accept, for he had very wide powers. He further submitted that no distinction should be made between the Indian members of the Council and their colleagues. If any was made they would be demoralising not only the whole Council but the Indian members as well. It had also been suggested that if they had the portfolio system they would not be able to get Indian members of the Council with the requisite experience of administration in India, and therefore, the Indian members would not be able properly to discharge their duties if placed in charge of a portfolio. It was next suggested that the period of appointment should be five years. While it was necessary to have men with experience in administration, it was equally necessary to have men who could place the public point of view before the Secretary of State. It was proposed that one-third of the Council should consist of the official class, one-third of the non-official class and the remaining one-third should be men of merit and ability in public life in the United Kingdom unconnected with the Indian Administration. This third would hold the balance between the two other sections. They would bring to bear upon the deliberations of the Council that independent judgment which was so characteristic of public men in this country. If these proposals were accepted, they would have a Council composed of three different groups—each specialising in a different branch, but all helping the deliberations of the Council over which the Secretary of State presided. The Secretary of State for India, to whatever political party he belonged, had always been an eminent British statesman who had done his best for India; but even the best of men required some kind of control and check. The Secretary of State, no doubt, was responsible to Parliament and the British Public, in theory, but in practice really he was not responsible; and what was finally suggested was that his salary should be placed upon the British estimates. In that case they would have real effective control by Parliament.

INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Passing to discuss the position of Indians in the various "part of the British Empire," Mr. Jinnah said that no other subject had so deeply stirred the minds of the people of India. They had always understood that they were members of the British Empire, but at this moment they were being denied the rights and privileges of British citizenship. Recent events in South Africa had created intense feeling which was only allayed by the wise and statesmanlike pronouncement of Lord Hardinge; and the action of the Viceroy, supported, as it had been, by British Ministers and by the British Parliament, had made a deep impression in the hearts of the people of India.

Mr. N. M. SAMARTH.

Mr. N. M. Samarth desired to associate himself with Mr. Jinnah in publicly expressing his thankfulness to Lord Crewe for the sympathetic hearing which he gave to the deputation on Monday last. As to the scheme for the reform of the India Council which they placed before his Lordship, it was necessary to bear in mind the conditions under which they laboured in India as well as here in regard to the redress of Indian grievances and the satisfaction of legitimate Indian aspirations. Under present conditions, a great deal depended upon having a sagacious, courageous, and progressive Viceroy supported in his efforts for the national advancement of India by a Secretary of State who was not only of one mind with him but who had the strength of character to back him up in spite of opposition from his Council which was mainly composed of Anglo-Indian officials, whose angle of vision differed from that of the freedom-loving Britisher and the educated Indians in matters which related to the political progress of India. Failing such a rare combination, the sun-dried bureaucrats were apt to get the upper hand, and, by burking and pigeon-holing and corresponding and shelving, and, if need be, wriggling out of past promises, to thwart all efforts calculated to bring about the political advancement of the people of India. The result was despair and discontent in India. No doubt, the British public, through its representatives in the House of Commons was, in theory, responsible for the good government of India. But he feared that ever since the days of Burke, India had been, more or less, the dinner-bell of the House of Commons, which was absorbed in momentous question nearer home, and had really no time to devote careful attention to Indian questions. Ordinarily, therefore, the bureaucrats in India and in the Council of the Secretary of State had it all their own way, and constituted a great hindrance to the political progress of the Indian people, the more so as the Secretary of State had no power to veto the majority of his Council in some matters vitally affecting the well-being of India. He did not think he could state the problem and the conditions affecting its solution in better language than that used by the distinguished statesman who had done them the honour to preside at the Conference that day—language which was as forcible as it was pointed, and showed a complete grasp of the situation. On October 30, 1897, the Right Honourable Leonard Courtney, as he then was, made a speech at Fowey, in the course of which he said:—

"After all, what was this Government of India to whom we were bound to defer, even if we thought they were wrong? Who were these ten or a dozen gentlemen who governed India? Who appointed them. How were they trained? What were their qualifications? How were these 300 millions of people ruled. He did not intend to enter upon that question now, but it was a serious question which would have to be very deeply considered. They could not very well have India governed by an Indian House of Commons, choosing its own Government, just as the British House of Commons chose the Government at Home. Things were not ripe for that yet. Nor could India be governed by the British House of Commons as the United Kingdom was governed. The House of Commons would be quite incapable of ruling British India in any direct fashion, and British India could not be left to govern itself. And so British India remained a question which would occupy our attention for some time, but it would have to be considered and dealt with very carefully. This bureau, this little set of people in a room, collected one scarcely knew how, put there one did not know why, having qualifications of which we had no surety, was not the final system of Government for India. The House of Commons never could do it, because it was already overburdened with work, and to undertake to govern India directly would infallibly break its back. But that great question would have to be considered; and if at some future time it fell to his lot to address them on the question of the Government of India and the problem of how to bring that Government into relation with modern life and secure some interpretation of Indian opinion and some authority for educated English opinion, he was confident he should be rewarded with the same attention and the same intelligence they had given him that night.

Since this speech was made, a notable step had been taken in the direction of securing some interpretation of Indian opinion.

on the Council of the Secretary of State. Lord Morley with his keen insight into Indian conditions and his earnest desire to do justice to the demands of educated India, admitted two Indian into the arcana of the India Council. But what Lord Morley gave to India was representation by selection. What they now prayed for was representation by election, so that the Indian members of the Council might be responsible to an educated and cultured constituency. The proposal to introduce elected members into the India Council was not new. In the debates of 1853 and of 1858 they would find it strongly urged upon the attention of both Houses of Parliament, and in 1858 a resolution was actually carried in these terms: "That with a view to the efficiency and independence of the Council, it was expedient that it should be partly nominated and partly elected." The resolution was supported by prominent leaders on both sides of the House. Mr. Disraeli supported the principle, and regretted that the distracted state of the country did not admit of a representation of the people of India itself. Lord Stanley, on whom devolved the charge of introducing and piloting through the House the measure which eventually became law as the Act for the Better Government of India, said: "He believed it was agreed on all hands that, if a satisfactory constituency could be found, that method of appointment would be the most satisfactory of all. No doubt the difficulty was in the attempt to find such a constituency." He added: "We are willing to introduce the elective principle if it were only possible to find a fitting and satisfactory constituency." The constituency was now available, and he asked them to help to build upon existing foundations, and use instruments already at hand. As to the fitness and satisfactory character of the constituency, there could be no question. But even if they obtained one-third elected Indian Council that would not mend matters. There would be no fair opportunity for effective work for them so long as the Council was overwhelmingly official and Anglo-Indian. In several matters of importance there was difference of opinion between Anglo-Indian officials and leaders of non-official Indian opinion. In order that the Secretary of State may be placed in a judicial position to hear both sides, it was necessary that the Indian members should not be placed in a hopeless minority. They therefore proposed that English public men should be introduced into the Council to hold the balance. He hoped that they would favourably consider the scheme they had laid before them, and so remodel the India Council as to appeal to the better mind of India and result in the cordial co-operation of Englishmen and Indians in the best interests of the Empire.

MR. MAZHAR-UL HAQUE ON THE PRESS LAW.

Mr. Haque said he wished to address the Conference on the subject of the working of the Press Act of 1910, and as he saw before him many representatives of the British Press he had no doubt that the question would prove an interesting one. In 1910 India was passing through a phase marked by crimes of violence, and it was considered necessary at the time that writings in the Press should be officially controlled. That was the very first act of the reformed Council of Lord Minto. The measure brought in was very drastic indeed—so much so that one of the most eminent judges, Sir Lawrence Jenkins, had declared that even the Bible might be brought under its operation. Those who at the time represented the Indian people on the Viceroy's Council were rather on the horns of a dilemma. They knew that it was necessary to control wild writings in the Press, but at the same time they were anxious that their liberties should remain intact. There was a good deal of discussion as to what course should be adopted to secure that end while giving the authorities the desired powers, and one of their endeavours was to give those who were affected the powers of testing the legality or justice of the action of the Executive. Indeed, Mr. Sinha, who was then Law Member, threatened to send in his resignation unless some such provision was inserted in the Act, and unless the people of India were given a right of appeal to the High Courts. That was the compromise that was eventually arrived at between the official and non-official members of the Council. Some of them had most reluctantly given their support to the Act, but they had had fears as to how it would work out. Those fears, unfortunately, had since materialised, and action had been taken under the Act which was never dreamt of at the time the legislation was under consideration. He might cite as an illustration the treatment meted out to the "Comrade," a weekly paper published at Delhi. The only misfortune of that paper was that it reprinted a certain pamphlet issued in Europe with an introductory article written by Sir Adam Block, of Constantinople. The Government of India declared that the pamphlet was calculated to bring the Christian subjects of His Majesty into contempt and hatred, and it issued an order confiscating all the numbers of the issue in which the pamphlet appeared. That action of the authorities was tested in the High Court at Calcutta. The case was tried by three eminent Judges, of whom Sir Lawrence Jenkins was one, and they declared that in their opinion, the editor of the "Comrade" had committed no offence, and was animated by a laudable object in reprinting the pamphlet, but at the same time they added that the powers of the High Court were almost nil under the Act, and that they could not give the editor the redress to which he was entitled. Would any Englishman—to use the word in its widest sense—support the retention for even one day of such a law on the Statute Book of this realm? He had another illustration to offer. The Zamindar was a paper published in Lahore, with a circulation at one time of nearly 17,000 daily. It was asked to give in the first place security to the extent of Rs. 2,000. This was forfeited, and then it was asked to give security for Rs. 10,000. That, too, was forfeited, and finally the entire Press was confiscated. This was an Act passed to stop crimes of violence, and it was never intended that its provisions should be thus misused and misapplied. The worst feature of all was that officials in India were now using the Act to interfere in religious matters. Personally he was not in favour of religious discussion in the Press; he did not believe it was useful, but why under the guise of this Act should the authorities put an end to papers which were purely religious? That ought not to be allowed, and it was dangerous as creating a doubt of the good faith under which the Act was allowed to pass. He had a third case of a paper at Lucknow. There was nothing wrong with its writings apparently, but the Deputy Commissioner ordered the editor to leave the town within a few hours. Such a thing could not possibly happen in England, and he could mention many cases in which men have been deprived of their only means of livelihood under the operation of this Act. He hoped they would see to it that an end was put to this state of things, and that pressure was brought to bear upon the Secretary of State and upon the Government of India to secure the repeal of this law. At any rate, if it could not be repealed, let the right of appeal from the orders of the Executive to the Courts be at least restored and made more effective and real.

MR. B. N. SARMA ON THE COUNCIL REGULATIONS.

Mr. B. N. Sarma discussed the regulations under which elections to the Legislative Councils were conducted. No one who dealt with that subject would be justified in proceeding with it without first expressing the gratitude of the people of India to the British Parliament and to all parties—to the Liberal Party, in particular, and, especially to Lord Minto and Lord Morley—for the Act of 1909, which enabled the people of India to place more often than before their representations and grievances before the Government, and enabled them to associate themselves with everyday administration to a large extent than heretofore. The people of India appreciated fully the statesmanlike sagacity which initiated those reforms at a time when India was being grievously misunderstood in the United Kingdom, and the benefits which had followed therefrom, both to India and England, and had helped to bring the two countries together in a firmer bond of union. At the same time it must be clearly understood that while thanking the British public for giving them that latitude and for enabling them to make a step in advance in the constitutional progress of their country, the people felt that the reform was to a large extent unreal in the sense that it did not place the real administration of the country in the hands of the people even in the smallest detail. They were grateful to the British public for giving them a power of election, but then they had it in substance before, though it was not recognised by Statute of 1909 recognised the principle of election and the principle of representation: but, unfortunately, by the regulations the privilege was reduced almost to nothing, because the Government retained the power of vetoing any election without assigning any definite reason. They asked that that grievance should be redressed at an early day. Again, Lord Minto and Lord Morley foresaw that there was absolutely no chance of Hindus, Mahomedans, Parsees, and Christians—men of various religious persuasions and with different interests—combining together to defeat the Government on any subject. In fact, it was not really a non-official majority, because the nominated non-official members felt that they were under an obligation to vote with the Government, and in practice it had been found that when they differed from the Government view, they felt it their duty to abstain from voting. The result was that it was absolutely hopeless, even if all the elected members joined together in trying to persuade the Government to act upon their views on a particular question, for them to carry any proposal against the wishes of the Government without the co-operation of the non-official nominees. Therefore, in practice, there was not a non-official majority, and he and his colleagues were asking, consequently, that a larger elected element should be introduced into the Provincial Councils, because there was absolutely no danger of these various elements combining together to defeat the Government unless there were something really wrong in the methods of the Government. They also prayed that some concession should be given in the matter of the composition of the Viceroy's Council. Further, they wanted the electoral body enlarged. All those who possessed the necessary educational and other qualifications should have the power of voting directly for a member of the Council. Special representation had been given to certain classes, but he and his colleagues felt that with a general electorate there would be no difficulty whatsoever in providing for that form of direct representation. There was no reason why the franchise should not be extended to all classes. There was an unhappy disagreement between the Hindus and Mahomedans and other communities on the question of representation, and he must not be understood to in any way ask for the special representation of the Mahomedan community on the various Councils to be reduced, or that the minority should not be protected by the Government. Wherever there was a minority the Government must make it its duty to see that it was properly represented in the Council. But at the present time there was an unnecessary amount of differentiation introduced in the regulations which caused heart-burning and which served no good purpose. The balance could be easily redressed by means of a general electorate which might make provision for larger representation in the case of certain bodies. They asked that the franchise should be conferred on all classes of the community possessing the same qualifications. Why should a Mahomedan with a landed qualification of Rs. 500 be given a vote, while a Hindu landowner must have a qualification of Rs. 1,000 before he could get a vote? And why should a Mohamedan graduate of five years' standing be able to vote for a member of Council, while a Hindu, Parsee, or Christian graduate of the same standing was debarred that privilege? Next he came to the restrictions placed on the choice of candidates. It should be left to the wisdom of the electors themselves to choose the man they thought best fitted, and they should not be confined to selection from a small group. They wanted a modification of the rule, too, which provided that no candidate should be eligible unless he was already a member of some public body. Finally, he came to the question of the powers of the Councillors themselves. In practice it had been found that they were merely an advisory body as, before the Council Act was passed, they possessed in reality no greater powers than they had under the Act of 1891. Any interpellations and resolutions could be vetoed by the head of the Government for no definite reason assigned, and in practice when they had wanted to discuss a certain educational question, they were first told it would be premature to do so, then they were informed at the next stage that they could not do so, because the matter was in correspondence with the Secretary of State and, then, when the final stage was reached, it was absolutely futile for them to raise the question. They asked that they should be given power to discuss all matters so that the Government of India might be placed in the position of hearing both sides before it arrived at a matured judgment. They had no privileges worthy of the name in financial and other matters, and they looked to the British Parliament which guided their destinies to give them wider powers in the future.

MR. SINHA ON THE SEPARATION OF EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS.

Mr. S. Sinha spoke on the question of the separation of judicial and executive functions. This was a question, he said, which concerned the administration of the Criminal Law in India. The more heinous crimes were tried by judges, with the addition of juries and in some cases juries. But the greater number of criminal cases in the country came before magistrates of different classes, who were directly under an official known as the district officer, who was also by virtue of his office district magistrate. This district magistrate was the head of the police. As such, he had the power of initiating criminal proceedings in all cases. He was responsible for the maintenance of law and order in his district, and in his various positions he was, as was said in India, thief-catcher and the judge at the same time. That was a system which was certainly subversive of what was known as British fair-play and justice. Under the rules which obtained in all civilised countries, the man who was responsible for starting criminal proceedings had no hand either in the trial or in the hearing of the appeal; but in India it was very different. The system, too, was calculated to act unsatisfactorily, because a magistrate trying the criminal charge was under the District Magistrate on whose recommendation his future prospects depended, and it was clear, under such circumstances, he could not do substantial justice in all cases. They had asked for this reform for a great number of years, but one reason for refusing it had been that of cost. He did not think that ought to be allowed to stand in the way, and he hoped, therefore, those whom he was addressing would give cordial support to this proposed change.

SIR GEORGE BIRDWOOD.

Sir George Birdwood briefly addressed the Conference at the request of the Chairman, and said he was there out of respect for his friend Sir William Wedderburn, with whose political views he always differed, although on other subjects, artistic and religious, he agreed with him. He had been very pleased with the temperate language in which the speeches delivered that day had been couched.

He appreciated the perfect loyalty which had been displayed, but there was only one thing which he wished to say, and that was that he was convinced that if the caste system in India was ever broken down it would mean the ruin of India.

MR. MACCALLUM SCOTT.

Mr. MacCallum Scott, M. P., expressed the pleasure with which he had listened to the clear statements of the Indian delegates of the reforms which they believed to be necessary in the interests of their country, and he hoped, if he took part in any debates in Parliament he would be able after hearing their speeches to speak with more advantage, both in the way of presenting information and helping the cause of good government in India.

MR. PHILIP MORRELL.

Mr. Morrell, M. P., said he had been astonished in listening to the speeches, not only by the reality of the difficulties with which their Indian friends were faced, but by the extraordinary moderation and reasonableness of their demands, and he trusted that their present visit to this country would prove of great service to the well-being of their fellow-subjects in India.

SIR HENRY COTTON.

Sir Henry Cotton expressed his conviction that the labours of the Indian delegates would not be altogether in vain in regard to the Councils Bill. He heartily congratulated Sir William Wedderburn on the success of the efforts he had been making, almost single-handed, for a long time to bring before the authorities in England matters which were of such serious concern to India.

Dr. John Pollen, of the East India Association, also spoke.

Mr. Jinnah proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman, remarking that the political horizon in India was very often dark and dismal, but it was men like Lord Courtney whose attitude brought a ray of sunshine and hope into their lives.

LORD COURTNEY SUMS UP.

Lord Courtney replied at some length. After declaring that all the credit was due to Sir William Wedderburn for bringing them together, he said the problem of the reconstruction of the Council of India so as to make it a more effective means of communication between the people of India and a Secretary of State was one of the profoundest importance. When he spoke upon it at Fowey seventeen years ago, he dealt with it as a problem to be considered, and not as one for which he had a ready-made solution. He foresaw many difficulties, some of a practical character, in bringing to Westminster elected representatives to join in the work of the Secretary of State's Council. Members of that Council hitherto had, no doubt, fulfilled advisory functions, but they had also joined in the administration, and particular subjects had been allotted to them. They were in that way joint assistants and advisers of the Secretary of State. But when it came to the question of bringing three elected members over, who were not to act primarily in the capacity of assistants and co-operators, but who would more properly be described as members of the Secretary of State's Opposition, whose duties would be to criticise and examine, and whose object by their criticism would be to modify and perhaps reflect the action proposed by the Secretary of State, that was an entirely new proposition, at which even the most advanced Secretary of State would feel a little staggered. By regulations the most vital reforms might be deprived of their vitality. For instance, there was no necessary submission to the Council on the part of the Secretary of State of any projects he might have in his head, and therefore, if their scheme was to be made effective, it would be necessary to provide rules and regulations by which the presence of these detached members would be made effective. He was making these criticisms in the most friendly way. He had felt it his duty to point out some of the difficulties which might not perhaps have been fully apprehended. It had occurred to him it was just possible that in this as in many other matters compromise might be possible, and that instead of sending over three elected members to sit on the Secretary of State's Council, it might be possible to elect a panel in India of forty or more persons who, by their previous training, by service under the Government, by knowledge, by position at the Bar, by their activity in commerce or industry, were fit and proper persons to assist and advise the Secretary of State in the exercise of his functions, and that the Secretary of State might have the privilege of selecting from that panel those whom he was advised would be most serviceable to himself. He threw this out as a suggestion for their consideration. He wished to make it plain to the delegates that there were difficulties to overcome.

The proceedings closed with a hearty vote of thanks to Sir William Wedderburn for his hospitality.

of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 20th January 1913, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only 18s. 4d.. Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

bears witness to the ever-growing demand for our products for Cricket, Tennis, Hockey and all games. Sportsmen realize that "the Perfecta" quality is unequalled. Graceful in design, they are lightly yet strongly made, giving pleasure to every user.

At the same time we make other qualities—to suit every pocket and can surely please you. Many hundreds of Clubs and thousands of individual players are using our goods to-day.

The Week.

Albania.

Durazzo, June 10.

In order to suppress the insurgent movement as speedily as possible the Government has decided upon a simultaneous advance from three sides, namely from Alessio, Durazzo and Valona. The advance is expected to begin this week. The rebels are attempting to resume negotiations with the Control Commission. The Prince and Princess to-day reviewed the Albanian forces and received an enthusiastic ovation.

Rome, June 11.

Marquis Di San Giuliano stated in the Indian Chamber yesterday that as a result of the enquiry into the arrest of Colonel Muricchio at Durazzo he telegraphed to the Italian Minister that Muricchio's innocence must be considered proved and that no value must be attached to the subsequent investigation by the Albanian Government and Dutch Officers. The Minister was also ordered to obtain satisfaction. After the Muricchio incident there has been exchange of views between Austria-Hungary and Italy and an agreement has been concluded to the effect that their respective agents in Albania shall be instructed to work harmoniously and to do the utmost possible to maintain Prince of Wied in power and avoid any appearance of preferential treatment of either Government and further to secure the despatch of warships by all powers to Durazzo.

Achmed Bey, one of the most distinguished Mahomedan leaders, has arrived at Tirana to negotiate with the insurgents. If his efforts are fruitless a general advance may be expected not later than Saturday.

Durazzo, June 12.

The Italian Minister at Durazzo has telegraphed that the insurgents this morning attacked the town in three places. Colonel Thomson, Commander of the Dutch Gendarmerie, was killed. Bluejackets are defending the Legations and the Royal Palace there being no other force available. At the outset it seemed that the town must be captured but the defenders rallied and now hope to be able to resist any further attacks.

Rome, June 15.

There has been continuous heavy artillery and rifle fire throughout the day. The Prince is leading the defenders.

Durazzo, June 15.

A wireless message received from a Cruiser on the spot says that the defenders at Durazzo have repulsed the insurgents from the precincts of the town after three hours' fighting.

Vienna, June 15.

A Times message from St. Petersburg states that M. Sazonoff and the Russian Minister have left for Bukharest. It is believed that an important conference will be held at Bukharest to consider measures to prevent an outbreak of hostilities between Turkey and Greece for which the imminent arrival of new Turkish battleships is expected to give signal.

London, June 11.

Greece and Turkey.

Athens, June 12.

Constantinople, June 12.

Talaat Bey, Minister of the Interior has announced that there have been regrettable incidents at Aivali. Officials, who failed in their duties, have been dismissed. Greek accounts of the situation, however, says the Minister are exaggerated.

Government has addressed a strong note to Constantinople, demanding the cessation of the persecution of Greeks in Turkey and the repair of the damage. Public opinion is most excited. People generally urge immediate and energetic action.

Athens, June 12.

Public excitement is increasing. In speech in the Chamber M. Venezelos described the arrivals of thousands upon thousands of hapless pitiable Greeks ejected destitute from Turkish territory. He declared that the situation was grave but it would become even graver. Unless conditions altered, Greece would not be content with mere lamentations. (Prolonged cheers).

After consulting with financiers Government has ordered the closing of Bourse owing to uncertainty of situation.

Athens, June 18.

Six steamers, chartered by Government, are continuously transporting refugees to the Aegean Islands.

M. Vénézelos, the Premier in the Chamber announced that the Turkish persecutions were unparalleled in history. They aimed at the elimination of the populations which have been inhabiting country for several thousand years.

Besides thousands of Greeks from Thrace, over 20,000 from Asia Minor have arrived in Greece and there are fifty thousand more on the Asiatic coast awaiting a chance to depart.

Constantinople, June 13.

Although the Porte has given categorical assurances that it will remove causes which compel the Ottoman Greeks to leave the country, nevertheless there are reasons to fear that Government are really bent on removing the Greek element from all strategic points such as the vicinity of Constantinople, Dardanelles and Smyrna Littoral. The Porte recently proposed to the Greek Government a scheme of exchange of populations which Greece accepted but before further progress could be made the existing situation arose owing to an action of the Committee engaged in settling refugees from Macedonia, the Committee evidently considering its plan to be more expeditious.

Constantinople, June 14.

The Greek Minister has presented a Note drawing attention to the treatment of Greeks in the Ottoman Empire and declaring that Greece will decline to take any responsibility for the consequences if the situation continues.

Athens, June 14.

Athens, June 15.

Though Turkey has not replied to the Greek note official circles are convinced that the Ottoman Government will follow its previous tactics making vague promises. These, it is declared will not satisfy the Greek public which demands the restoration of Greek refugees in their home and the payment of indemnity. The Greek Naval preparations are proceeding most actively.

Constantinople, June 15.

Talaat Bey who had been sent to enquire into the situation telegraphs that in various places in Asia Minor he has succeeded in reassembling the Greek population and in inducing numbers of families to return to their homes.

London, June 16.

Many regard the supremacy at sea as the crux of the Turco-Greek position. Turkey's dreadnoughts are now being completed at Elswick and Barrow, but an outbreak of war would place an embargo on them. It is noteworthy that lack of funds on both sides is likely to be a pacific factor.

Constantinople, June 16.

The Turkish press takes a calm view. The Tanin says that if Greece intends to make a noise, Turkey will remain unmoved.

Belgrade, June 15.

The Cabinet is discussing the Turco-Greek position in view of the Greco-Servian Agreement which compels Servia to mobilise in the event of a war. It is hoped however, that the Powers will mediate to preserve peace.

Constantinople, June 16.

Pessimism is felt in the official circles here regarding the Turco-Greek situation. Fighting has occurred at Menemen and Phocia. Forty inhabitants of Menemen are reported to have been killed while defending the town.

Malta, June 16.

The Hague, June 16.

The International Conference to consider the putting of the Opium Convention into force has opened. The Foreign Minister announced that Turkey and Servia had refused to agree to the Convention. Greece had made reservations regarding the new territories and Austria-Hungary had agreed to it in principle. Britain and her colonies had signed.

The Bagdad Railway.

London, June 16.

The Anglo-German agreement regarding the Bagdad Railway has been initialled in London by Sir Edward Grey and Prince Liebhowsky. A complete understanding has been reached on all questions.

Persia.

London, June 12.

The Times publishes a gloomy leading article with regard to Persia, expressing fear, that a crisis of unusual gravity is approaching. One aspect is that the whole problem of restoration of order will probably have to be tackled afresh. The journal believes that Swedish officers have worked arduously and gallantly but that on the whole they have not succeeded and are not likely now to succeed. The other aspect relates to the neutral zone in which the British interests almost exclusively lie and in which except for a few cities freebooters are almost supreme. The Times declares that the Persian question cannot be allowed to drift for ever and that the problem of the maintenance of order may soon bring to a head.

London, June 16.

In the House of Commons to-day, Sir J. Flannery asked whether Government contemplated formal annexation or establishment of a protectorate over the neutral oil-bearing zone in Persia. Mr. Acland said that the answer was in the negative.

Mr. Churchill replying to different questions regarding the Anglo-Persian Oil Company said the examination of the property and plant of the Company had satisfied the Government that the present capitalisation was reasonable and that the potentialities of the proven territory fully justified the expenditure on behalf of Navy.

Home Rule.

London, June 11.

The Stock Exchange takes a gloomy view of the Irish situation and the markets are depressed. The rapidly growing number of Nationalist Volunteers is the absorbing topic in the Lobbies. Moderate estimates place them at a thousand.

The seriousness of the position is realised by the Liberals numbers of home, speaking in their constituencies said that it was the final proof of the weakness of the Government in allowing drilling and arming in Ulster.

London, June 11.

In the House of Commons to-day Mr. Asquith announced that the amending Bill would be introduced in the House of Lords before the Home Rule Bill if the opposition desired it.

London June 11.

Mr. Birrell replying to Lord Robert Cecil said that the figures supplied to him showed that the Nationalist Volunteers numbered 80,000 (eighty thousand). But these figures varied daily. He had not been informed as to the number of arms but the Government were giving their attention to the action of both, he forces.

London, June 12.

Mr. Bonar Law opened the Unionist campaign in Scotland at Inverness last night. He dealt at some length with the Ulster question and said the outlook was a conflict between the Government and the Nation in which the Nation was bound to win. Whatever calamities were ahead the determination of Ulstermen was fixed. No cleverness or manœuvring would make them submit to Dublin Parliament.

London, June 12.

A serious split occurred in the Nationalist Volunteer movement. The Provisional Committee governing the volunteers refused Mr. Redmond's co-operation and decided to organise a force on its own lines. Mr. Redmond now denounces the Committee as self-constituted and says that the majority on it do not support the Irish party, which is supported by 95 per cent. of the volunteers. He dwells upon the grave responsibility of military organisation and affirms that unless the committee reconsidered its decision, he would appeal to the volunteers to organise themselves independently until the Convention can elect a permanent governing body.

London, June 16.

In the Lords to-day Lord Crewe informed Lord Lansdowne that Government proposed to take the second reading of the Home Rule Bill on the 30th instant, intending the Bill would be introduced next week. This would give the Opposition ample time to consider its position. It had been hoped, he added, that the Amending Bill would be the result of conversations between the parties that still held good. Lord Lansdowne affirmed that the time for discussing the Amending Bill was altogether inadequate as this was the only measure which mattered.

Lord Lansdowne emphasised that events had been moving with alarming haste in Ireland but Government had done nothing to mitigate the strain, or towards conversations. The Opposition would not proceed with the discussion of the Home Rule Bill if they were only given a chance of seeing the Amending Bill for a few days before the main discussion.

Lord Crewe replied that perhaps an agreement could only be reached by public discussion rather than by conversations. He understood that Lord Lansdowne preferred a public discussion. If an agreement were reached, it mattered little by what road it was reached.

Lord Lansdowne subsequently give notice of a motion to-morrow censuring Government for delay in producing the Amending Bill.

Indians in Canada.

Victoria, June 10.

Mr. Roche, Minister of the Interior has telegraphed to the Mayor that the Government intends to enforce the Immigration law. He expects that unless the law is defeated in Court on some technical ground the Government will be able to handle the question with satisfaction to British Columbians.

Immigrants are now appealing again before the Court of Enquiry. Fourteen more have been allowed to land having been formerly in Canada. It is anticipated that none of the remaining 354 will be admitted. Meanwhile it is so ill not known if the ship will be ordered back East by the owners if the charter money is not paid.

Victoria, June 11.

The exclusion policy will not be enforced until all "Komagata Maru's" passengers have been examined. The owners have ordered the vessel to return to the Orient but the immigration officials understand that arrangement will be made to keep her at Vancouver until the conclusion of the hearing of the Indians' appeal in the Canadian Courts.

London, June 11.

Replying to a question in the House of Commons regarding the "Komagata Maru" Mr. Harcourt said that he did not doubt that the Canadian authorities were acting in accordance with the law of the Dominion. He was communicating with the Governor-General but at present he was not prepared to make any statement.

Victoria, June 12.

Two Vancouver Hindus have deposited the balance of the "Komagata's" charter money. If the owners accept it the vessel can remain for upwards of three months longer. Full instructions for disposition of the steamer are expected by cable daily. Only twelve more immigrants have been examined. They were all rejected.

Victoria, June 14.

The Court of enquiry into the case of Indians on board the "Komagata" has been suspended. Reason has not been stated. It is believed that authorities are awaiting the result of the communications between the Imperial Government and the Canadian Government. "Komagata's" owners have not replied to the offer of Vancouver Indians to pay the balance of charter money. Lloyd's agent is not attempting to dispose of the cargo of coal.

Colonising India.

London, June 12.

Sir Harry Johnston in a letter to the Times on the subject of Indian Immigration refers to the report of English and German travellers regarding the sparse population of many parts of Indian mountainous regions in which paradise is still waiting inhabitants. Sir Harry asks: "Why promoters of genuine emigration schemes in India do not endeavour first of all to colonise to the fullest extent 2,00,000 square miles of habitable but unpopulated India?"

South Africa.

Cape Town, June 11.

Government has been twice defeated on the amendment to bring the Premier mine under the Income Tax Bill. The proposal had been strenuously opposed.

Cape Town, June 12.

Government continues in office. It admits the gravity of its defeat but considers that it would be detrimental to the country if much useful labour of the session were abandoned.

The Cape Times and South Africa News argue strongly against Government resigning. Nevertheless the Cabinet takes a most grave view of its position owing to the recent diminishing majority and difficulties with some of its followers regarding taxation which the Cabinet considers essential.

Our London Letter.

London, May 29.

HOME RULE BILL THROUGH THE COMMONS.

The Home Rule Bill has passed through the House of Commons and has been already introduced formally in the Lords. Acting on the advice of the Times the Opposition decided not to discuss the Bill and consequently the division was taken a day earlier than was expected. The House adjourned for the Whitsuntide recess on Monday last and so hon. members were free to run up to Epsom on Wednesday to see the Derby run. The political situation has not materially changed during the week and every-body is now awaiting the introduction of the Amending Bill after the holidays.

Talking of the Derby, by the way, I noticed the King's four Indian Orderly Officers thoroughly enjoying themselves in a reserved box in the Grand Stand. Can it be that their genial presence on the course had anything to do with the dramatic success of Durbar II? The victory is most cosmopolitan; the winner is an English thoroughbred born in France, his owner is an American sportsman, his groom a negro, his trainer an Irishman and he bears an Indian name. A good omen indeed for the advancement of the Irish and Indian cause!

DIPLOMAT EMBRACES ISLAM.

According to the Constantinople correspondent of the Times, Alfred Rustem Bey de Bilinski, recently appointed Ambassador in Washington, has embraced Islam. The Turkish Press expresses satisfaction at the conversion of Rustem Bey, who has taken the name of Ahmed, and announces that the Sultan has presented the convert with his own chaplet and other tokens of Imperial favour.

MEDALS IN INDIA.

"D. I. K." writes to the Times suggesting that a special medal should be awarded to every British soldier (including, of course, officers) who has served in the Indian N.-W. frontier stations for seven years in peace time, considering the constant risks such soldiers are exposed to during the period of their service in those districts, a "risk" almost as great as that in time of war. This is indeed an extraordinary proposal and is sure to be keenly resented by every soldier, who is really devoted to his profession. The suggestion is both grotesque and absurd and the writer of this letter must not have fully realised the real spirit that prevails in the military circles. The King's soldiers would certainly appreciate and highly value any medals or decorations that may have been awarded to them for distinguished service on the field, but none except a "feather-bed soldier" would attach the least importance to medals given to him for having merely spent a certain period in the frontier districts of India in routine peace duties, simply because occasionally there may possibly be a "rising" or a "disturbance" amongst the tribes residing in those districts or else on account of isolated outrages on the part of irresponsible and depraved Indian soldiers, which may unhappily involve the lives of a brave officer and an equally brave comrade of the murderer himself. Such mad acts of revenge for a real or fanciful wrong are as common in the military barracks in this country as they are in India and are not by any means characteristic of the frontier stations.

"Landi Kotal," in the course of an excellent reply to the letter of "D. I. K.," writes as follows in the Times:—"The abnormal craving for medals and decorations revealed by Englishmen in India, both civil and military, is one of the most contemptible things visible in the Empire to-day. The climax is surely reached in the letter you publish from 'D. I. K.' He wants every soldier who serves for seven years in frontier stations to have a special medal. Really, what are we coming to? In my day in India, every keen soldier tried to get to the frontier in the hope of seeing service. They never sought medals. They sought danger gladly because that was their trade and they loved it. Now, apparently, any man who puts in seven years amid the amenities of Peshawar, not even constantly, wants to wear on his chest a medal which will say, 'Look at me! I am a remarkable fellow! I lived for seven years in a place where I might have had a shot fired at me when I walked through the native bazaar! What do you think of that?'"

"I know the frontier and know the hard, anxious work often done there, and the risks that are run. But men go there as a rule of their own choice. If they want patting on the back for it they are of the sort that ought to stay at home and sell groceries. To do them justice, I believe the best men don't. They say, 'I am doing my job' and are content."

COLOUR AND THE EMPIRE.

The Daily News and Leader writes a splendid leading article on the above subject, which is particularly welcome at this moment when the colour question is again prominent in Canada. "The same day," proceeds the article, "brings news from one quarter of the Empire of the probable settlement of a problem and from another quarter of the definite posing of a very similar problem. The Bill introduced by the South African Government, on the basis of the findings of the recent Commission of Inquiry, seems to be accepted by the local Hindus (i. e. Indians) as satisfying their demands. On the other hand, practically all the Hindus on the Japanese ship now lying off British Columbia have been denied admittance, and their case will be fought through the law courts, unless the local officials by the exercise of force prevent the testing of the question of right. We pointed out a few days ago that the Hindu question in South Africa is in a very important respect different from the Hindu question in Canada. The South African Hindus have accepted, with very slight qualifications recognised by the South African Government, the principle of exclusion. They have been fighting for decent treatment of such Indians as live in South Africa. That claim had its complications owing to the dread by white labour and commerce of the competition of Asiatic labour; but once the shutting of further immigration was accepted, the question was reduced to manageable limits. The claim of the Indians now seeking to enter Canada is a claim as British subjects to enter Canada freely and without restrictions. "I intend to use every legitimate course I can pursue to make sure if it is true that East Indians will not be permitted to land in your country," says their leader, and if the few hundreds in the Komagata Maru were to make good their claim they would be followed by countless thousands.

"Opinion on the Pacific Coast and doubtless throughout Canada is as emphatic as opinion in South Africa. . . . Probably, therefore, the Indian question in Canada will after a brief struggle be reduced to the form and the dimensions of the Indian question in South Africa. It will lose its local acuteness, but that does not mean that it will vanish. On the contrary, it will become visible as an Imperial problem free from all obscuring accidental circumstance. Our Imperialists in moments of expansion cry civis Britannicus in imitation of the ancient proud civis Romanus. But the Roman citizen, when citizenship became the badge of all free men throughout the Empire, was something very different from this British citizen. The Roman citizen, whatever his colour, race, or faith, could pass freely throughout the Empire and everywhere enjoyed equal rights. British citizenship is a thing of grades and territorial limitations. A white man may go where he will and everywhere be a citizen. A coloured man may be free here, excluded or a pariah there. To make his situation more bitter his rights are less than even the non-citizen enjoys who has a white skin.

"Whether an Empire can hold together with so strange a practice and so strange a theory of citizenship is a disturbing question. It is complicated by the fact that the colour line raises international as well as Imperial difficulties of great magnitude. Beyond India are China and Japan, and beyond Christianity is a religion, Islam, which has swept away race and colour as social and political barriers. . . . But no man can believe that uncompromising negation is the last word of civilisation on the colour question. No civilisation which can be content to see colour an eternal badge of separation can satisfy, and men of vision and understanding must never cease from fighting to prevent an economic issue becoming an unconquerable prejudice. The gravest feature of the present situation is not that exclusion is being urged on behalf of the standard of life, but that it is being coupled with assertions of moral and intellectual superiority, and of the existence of social and political incapacities, for which there is no warrant. Those passionate and false indictments of half mankind eat into the souls of those who draft them."

The Times also deals with the same subject in a brief leader, under the heading, "Empire day". "One problem in particular", says this journal in the course of the article, "whose solution not the most optimistic would forecast with any confidence, overshadows its close (i. e. the period of twelve months ending on "Empire day"). The claim of our Indian fellow-subjects to be admitted without restriction into the overseas Dominions is being asserted with fanatical resolution in Canada to-day, as it was asserted, though in a somewhat different form, in South Africa earlier in the year. Canadian statesmen may be relied upon to face the problem with discretion and resolution. They will not, of course, forget the interests of their own people. But it is equally certain that they will allow no spirit of narrow partisanship to blind them to the importance of the Imperial considerations which are inevitably involved in this question. The Government of Canada has already proved itself in this respect. We have no doubt that the present crisis will supply it with another occasion."

Considering that the Times in its Empire Day Number has devoted three full pages to Australian matters, two pages to those of South Africa, Canada and even Rhodesia, whilst it has contended itself with only one solitary page on the Indian affairs, the two or three sentences above referred to clearly indicate that it is nonetheless fully alive to the gravity of this vital question.

COUNCIL OF INDIA BILL: AN ELECTIVE ELEMENT INTRODUCED.

The Bill to amend the law as to the Council of the Secretary of State for India, just introduced by Lord Crewe, differs in at least one important respect from the outline of his proposals given in the House of Lords last Session (July 31). He then had no intention of modifying in any respect the Secretary of State's discretion in the selection of members. But his admiration of reform, as is well-known, led to a demand at the Karachi Session of the Indian National Congress and the Agra Session of the Moslem League that the Indian members should be elected by the elected members of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils in India, and it was suggested that the Indians should form one-third of a Council of nine members.

At a conference following a breakfast given by Sir William Wedderburn to a delegation from the Congress a fortnight ago Lord Courtney suggested the possibility of electing a panel in India of 40 or more persons who, by previous training in various fields, would be fit and proper persons to assist and advise the Secretary of State in the exercise of his duties, the Secretary of State to make his selection from that panel. This scheme finds a place in the Bill. It is provided that at least two members of the India Council "must be domiciled in India," a phrase which is evidently intended to have the same connotation as the familiar legal term "a statutory native of India." These members are to be selected from among the persons whose names appear on a list chosen for the purpose by the non-official members of the Indian Legislatures, in accordance with regulations to be made by the Secretary of State in Council.

The salary of the Councillors, reduced by Lord Morley's Act of 1907, when he introduced an Indian element by the nomination of a Hindu and a Mohammedan member, is to be restored to the previous figure of £1,200 yearly. The members of Indian domicile, however, are to have an additional yearly allowance of £600.

Lord Crewe also foreshadowed the attachment of individual members to the various departments of the India Office in substitution of the system authorised by the Act of 1858 of committees "for the more convenient transaction of business." The Bill expressly widens the statutory authority of the Secretary of State to send to India "secret" orders without communicating them to Council, by including within their range matters relating to any question gravely affecting the internal tranquillity of India or the interests of India in any other country, or the peace or security of any part of His Majesty's Dominion. But it should be noted that this is without prejudice to the Council's statutory control of Indian revenues.

MR. M. A. JINNAH INTERVIEWED BY THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

Mr. M. A. Jinnah has given a Daily Telegraph representative the following summary of the more important points which the Indian National Congress wished to bring to the attention of the Government:—"To begin with (said Mr. Jinnah) I may say that Lord Crewe's action in inviting Indian opinion on his bill has produced very favourable impression in India. At present the India Council consists of ten members. Two are financial experts and the others—nominated by the Secretary of State—are connected with the administration of India. Lord Morley, in order that his advisers might be kept in touch with Indian opinion, nominated two Indian members to the Council; but these gentlemen, although they had done excellent work, are nevertheless nominated and not elected. We think the time has come for the elective principle to be introduced; for there is now, what there was not a generation or two ago, an Indian electorate.

"Our proposal is that the India Council should consist of nine members, appointed for five years, but eligible, of course, for a further term of service. Three of these members would be officials connected with the Indian administration, nominated by the Secretary of State; three would be Indian representatives; and the remaining three would be men of recognised ability in the public life of the United Kingdom, not connected with the Indian administration. These last three members would bring an entirely independent judgment to bear on the problems submitted to the Council, and would, when necessary, hold the balance between the other two parties.

"A most important matter is this. We propose that the three Indian members, not being officials, shall be elected by a responsible electorate, viz., the representatives of the local legislative Councils, who number altogether about 140. With such a small and weighty electorate as this it is clear that no irresponsible person could be chosen as a representative on the Council. We disapprove of the suggestion that a panel should be formed from which the Secretary of State could select three members; for our experience leads us to believe that such a scheme would not work well in practice. The portfolio system, which has likewise been suggested, would also be unsatisfactory; for the Council should be advisory, not administrative; and the best results would be obtained if the members of it were not tied down to any particular department."

Mr. Jinnah went on to refer to the feeling of bitterness which had been aroused in India by the drastic regulations of the Press Act—a measure, he thought, which a Council on the new lines proposed would advise the Secretary of State to modify. The main grievance is that newspapers have to provide security before they can publish; and if the executive forfeits the security, or seizes the paper, no appeal to the High Court is permitted. This is felt to be a severe restriction on the liberty of the press.

MR. MAZHAR-UL-HAQUE TO SPEAK ON "INDIAN NATIONALISM."

At to-morrow's meeting of the London Indian Association, Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque will deliver an address on "Indian Nationalism." Among other speakers will be the Hon. Mr. B. N. Sarma, Mr. S. Sinha, and the Hon. Mr. K. Sahay.

TETE À TETE

Lord Hardinge's birthday falls on the 20th June, and the event brings vividly to mind the spell that his personality has woven over the hearts of the Indian people. The widespread and genuine respect that he has succeeded in creating for himself since his assumption of office and the measure of public confidence that he enjoys to-day as a statesman responsive to the needs of the times have fallen to the portion of only a few of his predecessors. Much of this success has no doubt been due to a happy concurrence of peculiar circumstances in which Lord Hardinge has had to play a conspicuous part and has thus incidentally revealed himself to the intimate gaze of the public. In the normal state of things a Viceroy is necessarily a mere symbol of British power, and only the privileged few are able to discern the real man beneath the head of Government of India robed in Viceregal dignity. The generality of the people have to content themselves with such glimpses of the man as they can get through his measures. Events of great magnitude and unique import have, however, brought Lord Hardinge into close touch with Indian sentiment, and his acts and movements have been quite unconsciously a process of self-revelation. He stands apart from his measures, self-revealed, intimately known to the people, for whom he feels genuine sympathy, and who hold him in whole-hearted affection and esteem. Such achievement has been rare in the careers of the many eminent administrators and statesmen who have spent strenuous years in the service of this country. The King-Emperor's visit to his Indian Empire is rightly regarded as marking an epoch in Indian history. India owes it to Lord Hardinge that such an historic occasion was utilised for the enunciation of a bold and sympathetic policy, and, although we disapproved of the way in which things were secretly arranged and were intended to be justified as accomplished facts, we must admit that behind the changes and boasts announced at the Durbar lay the inspiration of the Viceroy, whom all recognised as possessing true Imperial instincts, courage and statesmanship of a high order. The transfer of the capital to Delhi not only marked the beginning of a new era, but would remain associated with a wider policy of trust and faithfulness of which the Government of India Despatch on the subject breathes such abundant promise. In spite of the calculated hysteria of an irresponsible Calcutta clique, the Delhi change has proved a popular measure and the people have realized to the full its ampler meaning. They are eagerly looking forward not only to the building of a worthy monument of British rule on a site consecrated by immemorial tradition and history, but also to the growth and fruition of the liberal policy which the new capital is designed to initiate. Lord Hardinge's personality is closely connected with both these aspects of the Delhi change. No one, therefore, can think without deep concern that his hand in the ordinary course will soon be withdrawn from the supreme control of affairs in India. His term of office is rapidly coming to a close—in November, 1915, he will complete his five years of Viceroyalty. But the policy to which his rule has given rise has not yet struck firm root in the soil. Things are naturally in a stage of transition still, and his departure towards the close of 1915 may prove little short of a calamity. No man is indispensable even in the governance of India. But the peculiarly fluid condition of things existing in this country needs for some time to come the uninterrupted guidance of a man who was the principal author of the new change and of new hopes and without whose presence the reconstructive effort, lacking even the necessary basis, may eventually sink into the limbo of might-have-beens. If India is to be governed in the spirit promoted by the King-Emperor's visit, Lord Hardinge alone has the will and capacity to make that spirit permeate the administration. He has given ample proof of his courage, sym-thy and transparent honesty of purpose. The Delhi Bomb outrage threw his sterling and noble qualities into bold relief. Even that dastardly crime has kept him undauntedly to his course with unshaken trust in the people. His simple and direct message of peace delivered to a distracted community at Cawnpore showed his remarkable gifts of sympathy and statesmanship, which place him far above the puny breed of officials whose sense of petty administrative conventions is often stronger than their sense of justice, or of the sacrifices of selfish ambitions which the consolidation of a great Empire must demand. His bold challenge to South Africa at Madras could only be uttered by a Viceroy having the interests of the Indian people closely at heart. His reply to the address of the Moslem Deputation showed that the most trying perplexities of office could not rob him of his sense of proportion. His deep and living interest in all questions relating to the material and moral progress of the people is well-known. The increasing attention now being paid to the growth of education and sanitation is in a large measure due to his initiative. It is manifest, in view of all this, that Lord Hardinge's presence at the helm of Indian affairs is absolutely necessary for some time to come. The liberal policy for which he stands has yet to materialise in liberal measures, and there is a deep-seated natural apprehension lest his retirement after a year and a half should make an end of his policy and lead to the extinction of all useful measures in an embryonic stage. This apprehension is still more strengthened by the restiveness occasionally shown by some Local Governments and their alarming susceptibility to the charms of drastic action. The continuity of the supreme control at this juncture, at least for three years more, seems to be most desirable in the best interests of the country. It is not, therefore, too much to hope that an earnest and unanimous appeal will go to the King-Emperor from the Indian people, praying for the extension of H. E. Lord Hardinge's term of office to seven years. We trust that Lord Hardinge himself, whose love for India and her people has won him universal regard and affection, will not grudge this protraction of his labours for a grateful people and that he will be induced to carry on his great burden for two years more. A superficial observer will be astonished at the spectacle of an arrangement under which the highest officer of the Crown in India is made to depart from the country just when he has got a firm grip of its manifold problems. But those who know by experience the demoralizing influence of semi-irresponsibility, particularly on Englishmen who have throughout their past careers relied on the strong support of Parliamentary control, need no other justification for the apparently paradoxical five-years' rule. The Indian bureaucracy slowly and imperceptibly, but, nonetheless, surely and decisively, fastens its grip on the Viceroy in the course of his career, and it is just as well that the rule exists. The recent precedent of Lord Curzon is somewhat misleading, for that pro-consul brought a great many of his despotic inclinations along with him. But it is there all the same, and it is against our prayer. We must not forget, however, that Lord Hardinge has so far escaped the baneful influences inseparable from his bureaucratic environment, and we may well rely on his outstanding personality to teach something of his own far-seeing statesmanship to myopic bureaucrats rather than to learn in the next three and a half years any of their habit of sighing for "Martial Law and no d——d Nonsense".

We have been favoured with the following communication from Lieutenant-Colonel E. C. Bayley, C. I. E., I. A., Private Secretary to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, from Simla, dated the 16th June, in connection with the Zamindar's recent warning and our comments thereon:—

SIR.—In your issue of May 2nd appears the following paragraph commenting on the orders passed by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab in regard to the Zamindar Press of Lahore:—

"In circumstances such as those attending Mr. Tollinton's warning to the publisher of the Zamindar, a high spirited person may be induced to do exactly that which the warning is designed to prevent. In such cases the person who warns only becomes an agent provocateur who, according to Sir Edward Carson, is a person despised even by the criminal classes. We are prepared to believe that Sir Michael O'Dwyer has no intention of provoking the Zamindar to incur the penalties of official displeasure under the Press Act. But His Honour has not chosen the best method of disproving the rumours current throughout Northern India that his aversion to the proprietor of the Zamindar does not date only from the commencement of his administration of the Punjab, but goes back to the days when, at his instance, as the British Resident at Hyderabad, Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services were dispensed with by the late Nizam, on the suspicion of having lampooned Mr. Walker, the Finance Minister of Hyderabad, in the columns of the "loyal" and staid Paisa Akhbar. At any rate, the Zamindar is not likely to thank His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor for his leniency any more than it thanked him for his unjustifiable order of last January which mulcted the Zamindar in a loss of some Rs. 20,000. If it was meant as an exhibition of His Honour's leniency it has failed to convince. It is nothing more or less than an indication that the Zamindar must be prepared for the worst so long as the Press Act is in force, Sir Michael O'Dwyer is the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab and the Zamindar continues his (We wrote "its". Ed. Comrade.) present policy. The Press Act is by this time notorious for the all-comprehensiveness of its scope and application, and until and unless the Zamindar ceases to be an independent critic of official acts and measures, it will provide every day a hundred excuses for the Punjab Government to punish it under that Act. The result would be the kind of impotent rage and despair which drives even those who appreciate to the full the blessings of British Rule in spite of its occasional shortcomings into the attitude of irreconcilable hostility. This is the genesis of three-fourths of the anarchy one hears of in India, and when we read of a bomb being thrown or a pistol being fired at some official of Government, while we denounce the outrage we also curse the crass stupidity of those who drove an otherwise well-intentioned youth into an inhuman anarchist."

The paragraph repeats the insinuation which has appeared on other occasions in your paper and also in the Zamindar that the latter paper is not likely to receive impartial treatment from Sir M. O'Dwyer because his aversion to Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, Editor of the Zamindar goes back to the days, "when, at his instance, as British Resident at Hyderabad Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services were dispensed with by the late Nizam on the suspicion of having lampooned Mr. Walker, the Finance Minister." That suggestion Sir M. O'Dwyer desires me to say, is absolutely untrue. When Resident at Hyderabad in 1907-09 he never knew and never even remembers to have heard of Mr. Zafar Ali Khan who was apparently then employed in a subordinate capacity in the Home Office of the Nizam's Government.

Mr. Zafar Ali Khan and three other British subjects in the Nizam's service were removed from that service by His Highness the Nizam's Firman dated 9th, October 1909 and deported from the State within 24 hours.

That order was passed without any prior reference to or consultation with the Resident. So far from Mr. Zafar Ali Khan having been dismissed and deported from Hyderabad at Mr. O'Dwyer's instance, Mr. O'Dwyer first heard of the matter after the deportation had been carried out and then addressed the Nizam's Government pointing out that the Resident should at once have been informed of the orders passed to prevent the risk of misunderstandings which might have arisen had the officials in question claimed as British subjects the Resident's protection or an asylum within Residency limits.

I am to request you to be so good as to publish at an early date the correct facts as above stated, at the same time reproducing the paragraph of 2nd May which gave publication to a rumour which is directly contrary to those facts. Sir Michael O'Dwyer would have preferred to take no notice of the paragraph in question, had not the unfounded insinuation which it contains found a wider circulation and now that the appeal of the Zamindar has been heard it is advisable to correct the misrepresentation.

Copies of this letter will therefore be sent to the Press.

I am,

Yours faithfully,
E. C. BAYLEY, Lt.-Colonel,
Private Secretary, Punjab.

In reply to this communication we took the earliest opportunity of forwarding the following explanatory letter to Lieutenant-Colonel E. C. Bayley:—

Our Explanation.

Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 532 of the 16th instant which has just reached us.

2. You reproduce from the Comrade of the 2nd May a paragraph entitled "The Agent Provocateur" and go on to say that "the paragraph repeats the insinuation which has appeared on other occasions in your paper and also in the Zamindar that the latter paper is not likely to receive impartial treatment from Sir M. O'Dwyer because his aversion to Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, Editor of the Zamindar, goes back to the days, 'when at his instance, as British Resident at Hyderabad, Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services were dispensed with by the late Nizam on the suspicion of having lampooned Mr. Walker, the Finance Minister.'"

3. To the best of our recollection the paragraph you have reproduced from the issue of the 2nd May contains the only reference ever made by the Comrade in connection with the Zamindar's troubles to the Hon. Sir Michael O'Dwyer's having been the British Resident at Hyderabad. We shall, therefore, be grateful if you would kindly specify on what occasions other than the one now alleged the insinuation referred to in your letter has been published in the Comrade.

4. As regards the Comrade's issue of the 2nd May, we respectfully but emphatically repudiate the suggestion that it contains any insinuation such as you allege. Rumours were undoubtedly current at the time in Northern India to the effect that His Honour's aversion to the Proprietor of the Zamindar did not date only from the commencement of his administration of the Punjab, but went back to the days when Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services were dispensed with by the late Nizam on the suspicion of his having lampooned Mr. Walker, then Finance Minister of Hyderabad, in the columns of the Paisa Akhbar. It was also rumoured that His late Highness had ordered the dismissal of Mr. Zafar Ali Khan at the instance of Mr. O'Dwyer, then British Resident. Without suggesting even remotely that these rumours had any foundation in fact, we stated that His Honour had not chosen the best method of disproving them. That is all that we wrote on that occasion, and I need hardly say that we are at all times prepared to abide by what we write. How this simple and plain statement can be construed into an insinuation of the nature you have alleged is beyond our comprehension.

5. With reference to what happened at Hyderabad, it is extremely gratifying to learn from your letter that Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services were not dispensed with by the late Nizam at the instance of the Hon. Sir Michael O'Dwyer, and we shall therefore gladly avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity of publishing your letter in the Comrade. However, we trust it will not be an impertinence to mention that had you written to us or to any other newspaper soon after the rumours current in Northern India were first brought to His Honour's notice it would have been still better. As it is, we have every hope that the publication of the facts of the case would prove to be the best, if a somewhat belated, method of disproving the unfortunate rumours.

6. Now that the Hon. Sir Michael O'Dwyer has not only taken notice of the paragraph published in the Comrade of the 2nd May, but has also directed that copies of your letter be sent to the Press, we trust you will withdraw the wholly unfounded statement contained in paragraph 3 of your letter with reference to our publishing an insinuation that the Zamindar was not likely to receive impartial treatment from Sir Michael O'Dwyer. On reconsidering the matter you will agree that it is highly unjust to us.

7. We are publishing this reply along with your letter.

I am,

Yours faithfully,
MOHAMMED ALI,
Editor of the Comrade.

We have more than once expressed our resentful astonishment in these columns at the vagaries of official translators of extracts from Urdu journals in the Punjab, and when Mr. Tollinton had that interesting discussion with the Zamindar on the correct interpretation of the word "expose" in Lord Morley's speech from which our contemporary had quoted, we could have hoped that when the officials were so anxious to discern the mote in a journalist's eye more care would be taken in future in the matter of removing the beam in official optics also than had been taken in the past. But Mr. Tollinton's English version of "khana-bar-andaz-i-chaman" in a well-known verse which has become proverbial as "destroyer of the garden, root and branch" destroyed our hope also "root and branch" even before the seed could germinate. In the reports of the proceedings of the Zamindar's Appeal in the Chief Court we notice the "destroyer of the garden, root and branch" again, and we see no change or reformation in our old friend. In fact the discussion in the Court about the "martyrdom" of a portion of the Cawnpore Mosque beats even the "root and branch" business quite hollow. Evidently nobody in the Punjab Secretariat has ever heard of the expression "shahid hona" in connection with the accidental dropping of a copy of the Quran on the ground even though by a Mussalman. We had been wondering how long Indian journalists could tolerate this "government by translators", and why they did not combine to contribute a considerable portion of the cost of the proposed institution in England for the study of the Oriental languages. But when we receive a communication such as that which we are now publishing what are we to say? Here, at least, there is no tyranny of translators. The Comrade is published in English and, as there is no refractory medium intervening between us and the officials, its meaning should be obvious. Yet the "insinuation" discovered in a very plain and straightforward statement takes our breath away. We have never disguised our strongly adverse opinion about the dealings of the Punjab Government with the Moslem Press, and if the repeated expression of our opinion does not induce that Government to rectify its blunders, we are afraid we shall have to write again and pitch our disapproval of its measures still higher. That is one of the duties of a newspaper and we never shrink from the performance of such duties no matter how unpleasant they may be, and no matter what we may have to suffer ourselves in carrying them out. This is part of the day's work, and at least, there is nothing else we can do except to grin and bear. But it never occurred to us that the Zamindar was not likely to receive impartial treatment from Sir Michael O'Dwyer because of some old grudge that Sir Michael was supposed to bear against its editor when neither Sir Michael was the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab nor Mr. Zafar Ali Khan the editor of the Zamindar. Even supposing that this explanation sufficed for the repeated punishment of the Zamindar, how were we to explain the far less justifiable dealings of the Punjab Government with papers like the Ahli-Harles and the Bahr? As we have explained in our letter to Lieutenant-Colonel Bayley, rumours such as those to which we had alluded in our issue of the 2nd May were undoubtedly current at the time. We ourselves heard any number of people explaining the attitude of the Punjab Government towards the Zamindar on those lines. An English official of considerable eminence whose services had been lent to Hyderabad had been brought into contempt in the columns of the Paisa Akhbar. Mr. Zafar Ali Khan was well known to be a writer of easy and caustic verse. He was in the service of the Nizam at the time. His services were soon after dispensed with in the usual way by His late Highness the Nizam, with a full pension and an order for quitting his dominions within 24 hours, as had happened even to such great men as the late Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk. Mr. O'Dwyer was then Resident, and people rushed to the conclusion that Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services were dispensed with at the instance of Mr. (now Sir Michael) O'Dwyer. We now learn from one of the two authoritative sources that people had, as often happens, (e.g. the Tory rumour about the Ulster "Plot" of the present English Ministry) rushed to a natural but false conclusion, and Sir Michael O'Dwyer had no more to do with the matter than, say, Sir James Meston or the editor of the Paisa Akhbar. But considering the wide prevalence of the rumour it is difficult to believe that it never came to the ears of Sir Michael O'Dwyer. In fact Lt.-Col. Bayley's letter seems to indicate that our paragraph of the 2nd May was not the only occasion when to his knowledge the rumour was published. What could have been more easy, we ask, than to have dropped a line to a newspaper without the least possible delay, and with or without a request that the source of information should not be divulged, to have authorised it to publish the facts of the case? We do not presume to suggest that we should have been selected for their publication; but there were a hundred other papers as well as ours which would have gladly published them. Are we to believe that

If this was, indeed, the secret of the silence, then we must frankly say we consider such pride to be wholly unsuited to administration. Half the difficulties of the world are due to misunderstandings, and the more the Government takes the Press into its confidence the better would it be both for the Government and the Press. We do not see why Sir Michael O'Dwyer should have waited till a rumour so unfortunate as this had received a "wider circulation", nor do we at all see the connection between the publication of the facts of the case and the Zamindar's Appeal. But what perplexes us most is that when His Honour is pleased to take notice of the paragraph published in the Comrade more than six weeks ago, his Private Secretary is not content with the statement of facts directly contrary to the unfortunate rumour alluded to in that paragraph, but tacks on to it an imputation against us of having not only once but repeatedly insinuated that Sir Michael O'Dwyer was consciously unjust to a Punjab journalist. Sergeant Buzfaz or even Mr. Govan Petman may read into "chops and tomato sauce" a world of meaning. But nobody expects the Punjab Government to have the least affinity to "Vakil Raj". We must warn Government that the constant use of the "directly or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, "allusion, metaphor, implication or otherwise" of the Press Act "is likely or may have a tendency to" create by imperceptible degrees a mental squint. Unwise measures always react on the administration that sanctions them and carries them out, and we fear the Press Act is already beginning to force Local Governments to discover an esoteric significance in statements as innocuous as Mr. Pickwick's hungry message.

The preceding three paragraphs were in type and the Hamdard had published a translation of the above correspondence when we received the following telegram from the Private Secretary to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the

Your 6033 of 17th received. For the first three lines in para. 3 of my letter of the 16th please substitute the following. "The paragraph repeats the 'insinuation which has appeared also in other papers that the Zamindar is not likely to receive impartial treatment from Sir M. O'Dwyer because of his aversion'—"

As the reader will easily see, this is the first-fruit of our reply and an answer to the humble request contained in para. 3 of our letter that Lt.-Col. Bayley "would kindly specify on what occasions other than the one now alleged the insinuation referred to in his letter 'has been published in the Comrade.'" On the 16th instant His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, or at least his Private Secretary, was under the belief that we had repeatedly offended by publishing an insinuation of conscious partiality against Sir Michael O'Dwyer, and that the Zamindar itself was not innocent either. However, three days afterwards, and perhaps immediately on the receipt of our reply, that belief undergoes considerable change. The Zamindar is discharged, if not acquitted, and we become only a "first offender." We are grateful for this change of belief, and are now encouraged to hope that a little re-consideration will convince Sir Michael O'Dwyer, with whose views we have so often found ourselves in whole-hearted accord, that the "insinuation" was wholly imaginary, and that all that we had been guilty of was a passing allusion to an unfortunate rumour which was so current in Northern India at the time that we should have thought at least every other Moslem visitor to the Government House would have reported it. May we not hope that this partial withdrawal will be followed by one which is complete?

A MEETING of many of the prominent citizens of Delhi was held in the Town Hall to-day, with R. B. Sheo Parsiad Sahab C. I. E. in the chair, to "congratulate His Excellency Lord Hardinge on the auspicious occasion of his birthday and wish him long life and every success." This was moved by R. B. Lala Sultan Singh Sahab. The following resolution was also moved by Mr. Mohamed Ali, supported by R. S. Lala Wazir Singh Sahab, and carried with acclamation:—"That in view of the great importance of an early completion of the work of building at Delhi a new capital worthy of this great Empire and in view of the necessity of further developing the policy of confidence and co-operation between the Government and the people, which has signified the dawn of a new era commencing with His Most Gracious Majesty's Durbar at Delhi in 1911, this meeting is strongly of opinion that the tenure of office of His Excellency Lord Hardinge, who has initiated such measures and policy, should be extended by at least two years, and prays that His Excellency would be graciously pleased to continue to undertake the burden of his heavy responsibilities as Viceroy of India for this additional period in the interest of the country, and that His Majesty's Secretary of State for India would be pleased to advise His Majesty to accept this humble prayer of his people." An executive committee consisting of fifty members, representing the Hindus and the Mussalmans of Delhi, has been appointed with a view to prepare and send a memorial to the Secretary of State for India and through him to His Majesty the King-Emperor to grant an extension of at least two years to His Excellency Lord Hardinge.

It is now upwards of eight months that Lord Hardinge visited Cawnpore to personally effect the settlement of the Cawnpore mosque affair which was accepted by the Mussalmans in the spirit in which it was offered. It is, however, a matter of infinite surprise to us that nothing has yet been done to restore the demolished portion of the mosque in accordance with the terms of the settlement. We are curious to know what the mosque authorities have been doing all these months. Sir James Meston, during his recent visit to Cawnpore, was reported to have held some sort of consultation with the mosque authorities, and the Hon. the Raja Sahab of Mahmudabad had also gone there for the purpose. We have not yet learnt the upshot of these consultations, but we would request the Hon. the Raja Sahab as well as the mosque authorities to let the public know how the matters stand. It is obviously the duty of the authorities to rebuild the demolished portion as soon as possible. Much unnecessary delay has already occurred, and we would like to know if any other cause is responsible for it than the procrastination of the mosque authorities themselves.

"Inherent Rights."

In the Pioneer's issue of June 11th appears a long letter of Mr. J. Renton Denning, at one time editor of our local contemporary the Morning Post, who writes from Delhi against the "inherent rights" of Indians "to migrate anywhere in the Empire as British subjects". The assurance with which he lays down the law on a host of subjects may or may not be the envy of all, but we feel certain that the freedom with which he expresses himself must be the despair of our fellow-countrymen. As an Englishman he says he would fain enter "a firm protest, couched in no ambiguous terms" against the claim of Indians to the full enjoyment of the rights of British citizenship. He tells them that "all this talk about right is an unwarrantable assumption." He pities the members of the Indian Government for "feeling some reluctance and being swayed by some hesitancy in 'dealing with this question au fond', though it is not clear whether he also envies their possession of power to act where many an equally important question of the rights of Indians is concerned. At any rate, he clearly suggests that there are thousands of Englishmen in India and thousands elsewhere "who feel most strongly that the time for 'very plain speaking is come, and that nothing else but plain speaking 'will serve in the matter.' That is not all. "If we are afraid of a 'little straight speech,' says Mr. Denning, so cruelly misjudging the 'thousands of Englishmen in India,' who fear nothing, 'we see clearly 'enough that our colonies will have no such scruples'; and then follows the terrible threat: "and to their plain speech they will add—'as indeed they are now doing—very plain action'!" Mr. Denning, therefore, concludes that "the problem is not one to be tackled with 'too carefully balanced phrases', and instantly put his resolve into practice, and even amplifies his determination, for we not only come across phrases which are none too carefully balanced, but notice a want of balance in ideas as well.

Now Mr. Denning will agree with us that one of the chief distinguishing characteristics of the English is that they are a sporting race. They instinctively abhor an unequal combat and whole-heartedly detest a bully. Some of the noblest traditions of the race are connected with the defence of the weak against the strong. What, then, are we to say of one like Mr. Renton Denning who becomes the spokesman of thousands of Englishmen in India as well as of thousands elsewhere, and as such indulges at the expense of Indians in what he calls "very plain speaking", threatening them at the same time with some "very plain action" on the part of his Colonial brethren? Can Indians, too, indulge in "very plain speaking" with the present large sweep of the law of sedition and the widespread net of the Press Act? No, it is not for one of our race and complexion to enter the lists with one of Mr. Denning's where "very plain speaking" is to serve for weapons. As for "very plain action," we are painfully aware that we are domiciled in a Dependency and dare not even dream of self government which alone entitles one to indulge in some "very plain action".

Nevertheless, Mr. Renton Denning is, like us, that very abject being, a journalist, and even though an Englishman and the spokesman of thousands of Englishmen, he could not have altogether forgotten "the rules of the game". We are, therefore, encouraged to hope that he is not as bad as he declares himself to be when he says: "I am not concerned here to defend my statement by argument. I make my assertion". At any rate, he will perhaps bear a little with a humble brother who would not only make his assertion to the contrary but also defend his statement by argument.

We begin with agreeing with Mr. Denning. We, too, like logic to be taken as "the basis of our reasoning", and it is all the more gratifying if it is "irresistable." We, too, are for exposing "the root of the matter". Leaving ancient history aside for a moment, and even modern politics, let us examine Mr. Denning's biology. The poor Asiatic does believe that he is the only type of humanity to whom exclusion applies, and the truth is not in the least different from this. If there are natural laws of exclusion besides artificial ones, the European also "without question, reaps the benefit, if benefit there be, of those natural conditions of climate and environment which exclude except in a few instances (relatively to the mass)" the dark man from European territory. When the Right Hon. John Burns became for the first time a Minister of the Crown and began as such to be sought after by Society, Mrs. Burns received an invitation to a dance from a Duchess. The Duchess had never called on Mrs. John Burns before and apologised for dispensing with this formality, stating as an excuse that Battersea Park was such a great distance from Grosvenor Square. Mrs. Burns in reply apologised for dispensing with the dance itself, stating as an excuse that curiously enough Grosvenor Square happened to be just as distant from Battersea Park as Battersea Park was from Grosvenor Square!

Well, why should Nature be credited with less logic than the wife of a plebeian English Minister? If heat kills, so does cold. Gordon's useful advice to put ourselves into the skins of other people had already impressed Lord Morley. We see that it has now impressed Lord Curzon also, who used it with great effect recently in appealing for funds for Oriental Studies. It has, therefore, evidently travelled quite a good distance in the last seven or eight years. We wonder how long it will take to traverse the distance between Mr. Renton Denning and Lord Curzon of Kedleston. With the temperature nearer 120° than 110° in the shade in Delhi, we can, we think, easily get into Mr. Renton Denning's fair skin, if he will only allow such an impertinence on the part of black men even in imagination. But has Mr. Denning ever tried to get into our sunburnt pigmented skin when the thermometer at Oxford registered several degrees below zero and we had to break the ice before getting our matutinal dip into the tub, or when a pea-souper garotted us in the neighbourhood of Liverpool Street in London at midday? Well, if Mr. Denning comes to think of it again he will find the Poles just as exclusive as the Equator.

But it is not much of a compliment to the Whites to place them no higher in the scale of adaptability than the polar bear. In that respect our Bhaloo is no better and no worse than his brother of the snow-white fur. But we have survived the ice-covered matutinal tub and the midday pea-souper which the Bhaloo of our country could not perhaps have done. Similarly, we believe, the white man who shares his domicile with the polar bear can survive even the 125° in the shade of Jacobabad. But it will not be remiss if we request Mr. Denning to study something of modern philosophy such as Nietzsche's who tells us, what ought to be only too plain, that man is born to conquer Nature, and instead of adapting himself to his environment, compels his environment to adapt itself to him. This is the true interpretation of the old proud boast that "Man is man and master of his fate" in terms of biology.

Mr. Denning remarks that "whatever may be said by certain 'enthusiasts profoundly ignorant apparently of physiological and 'biological laws, no sane Englishman imagines, that he can enter 'into India, settle down and establish a posterity that shall be 'come rooted in the soil of the land of his temporary adoption and 'still remain English." Mr. Denning is right. He was wise to qualify his "Englishman" as he has done it, and he would have been wiser still if he had qualified his "certain enthusiasts" not only with the apparent ignorance of "physiological and biological laws" but also with the certain presence of insanity. Of course, no Englishman can do all that Mr. Denning suggests and remain an Englishman and Mr. Rudyard Kipling was apparently one of these "enthusiasts" when he wrote all that stuff about East being East and West being West. But is it not the same thing as saying "no sane Indian imagines that he can enter Canada, 'settle down and establish a posterity that shall become 'rooted in the soil of the land of his temporary adoption and still 'remain Indian"? But who expects, or even wants either of them to remain wholly unchanged? It is with no sudden access of humility that we confess we Indians can learn a great many useful things from a domicile, or even sojourn, in other lands, and can unlearn an equally large number of useless or harmful things. Nor can Mr. Denning's "sane Englishman" say he is the last word in everything good and has nothing to learn or unlearn from a domicile or a sojourn in the East. While fully admitting that the laws "of climate, of environment, of nature"—not so "inscrutable" now with the progress of science as Mr. Denning seems to believe—have considerable effect on the physical and mental condition of man, we have already suggested clearly enough that the higher the individual or the race in the scale of fitness for the struggle of life, the more he or it would be able to assert himself or itself against climate, environment and nature and adapt them in a greater or lesser degree to his or its own desire. If the Asiatic is made of an inferior clay, as so many pseudo-scientific western politicians assert, or even if, generally speaking, he is at present in a lower grade of efficiency for life's struggle, as we all admit, he would be able to grapple with the climate, environment and nature of Europe and America all the less efficiently than the European in Asia or Africa. This bar of exclusion provided by the Asiatic himself is surely much more effective than any outside bar, whether natural or artificial. But in any case, if an Englishman loses some of his "Englishmanity" by a domicile in India, must he not put up with it as part of the bargain? Has he not enough consolation in the fact that whatever he loses merely by a sojourn has generally to be put up with by others as well as by him? Is not that the price of Empire throughout history? Did not Rome, while Romanizing the rest of her great Empire, herself become something less than Roman? Why should England alone have a world-wide Empire and escape the forces of Imperial reaction? And we would be the last to suggest that such reaction is altogether a loss. Imperial Rome became not only something less, but also something more than Roman.

But if it is suggested that it is impossible for an Englishman to be domiciled in India without complete degeneration and demoralization, we must join issue with Mr. Renton Denning. The Aryans who came to India were believed to have come to this country from a Central Asian home as cold as most European and American countries. But Mr. Tilak's great researches have led us to believe that the Indo-Aryan race migrated from an Arctic home which, Mr. Denning will allow, is considerably colder than the coldest part of the British Empire. Yet for centuries the Aryan in the Indian tropics compared with the Briton who was dressed in woad was the more efficient of the two.

So much for biology. Let us now glance at Mr. Denning's economics. We fear here, too, our verdict is not likely to be very pleasing. "The immigration of the white man into India.....in no way lowers the economic status or standard of the native population. The white man cannot"—probably Mr. Denning means "does not"—"take away the inherent right of living by his labour from the Indian labourer or the Indian shopkeeper or the Indian of small means in his own native land." So says Mr. Denning. And yet he asks: "Will any one dare to assert that Asiatic immigration on any extensive scale into such a country ('a white man's country') does not weaken the white labourer's inherent right to labour and receive in his own country the fair wages of his labour?" We fear the would-be hostess of Mrs. John Burns will have to go on repeating for some time her discovery that Grosvenor Square is just as far from Battersea Park as Battersea Park from Grosvenor Square before Mr. Denning will grasp the fact that natural and economic laws do not differentiate against the whites as human and political laws often do against the blacks, the yellows and the browns. In each case there is competition. The few, able and enterprising European and American captains of industry in Asia compete with the Asiatic and amass great wealth by beating him down by dint of greater business capacity, organization and enterprise. The few or the many sober and thrifty Asiatics desire to compete with the European, American or Colonial in countries each of which through a sheer assumption, which we hotly challenge, Mr. Denning calls a "white man's country," and wish to amass a moderate amount of wealth by beating him down by dint of greater sobriety and thrift. If the one weakens the right, inherent or otherwise, of some people to labour and receive the fair wages of their labour in their own country, so does the other. But the true application of economics to politics would suggest that in neither case are the rights disturbed. To the Asiatic the white entrepreneur is an exemplar whose competition is not a curse but a blessing in disguise. The Bishop of Calcutta has already declared publicly that the commercial Englishman supplies just those qualities of just, honourable and straight dealings of which India stands so much in need. Is there no one who would bear a like testimony to the sobriety and thrift of the Indians in Africa and Canada? To the European, the American and the Colonial, the humble Asiatic may not presume to be an exemplar; but it is certain that his competition would prove anything but a curse if it teaches him sobriety and thrift at a time when what is called a "high standard of living" is unduly exalted, and comfort and even luxury have become the measure of civilization, or if necessity becomes once more the mother of invention and the white man discovers some new device that may make him comparatively independent of the Asiatic's unskilled labour.

But if Mr. Denning still insists on considering the coloured man's competition with the white man "a wrong against him individually and collectively" and thinks "he would be a fool—and a dastard—if he did not stand up for that inherent right, spill his blood in defence of it if necessary—despite all the theoretical jargon of international politicians, dreamers and comfortably-off hair-brained and crack-brained theorists", all we can say is that here the laws of man have reformed those of nature and at least the Indian is helpless. The Indian is no fool, as Gandhi and Gurdit Singh are proving; but if he is a dastard, is it his own fault or his Maker's, that being still a man he has lost all virility, that excepting for propagating slaves or seditionists he is emasculated and that even compared with the women of England he is unsexed? But perhaps he is not a dastard altogether. If he has not the weapons of offence and has lost the trick of killing others, he has still something of the old world about him. He can still spill his own blood in the defence of his inherent rights, and he has shown that in South Africa. But let us not talk of spilling blood, for even the spilling of ink is now a crime.

Dr. Ibuka writes an interesting article in The Japan Magazine on the subject of the colour bar. He had interviews with President Wilson and Mr. Bryan, and it is an irony of fate that the latter, a trenchant critic of the British Government in India, should have had to talk to Dr. Ibuka, a Japanese, as Mr. Denning and many others talk to us. To Mr. Bryan's argument Dr. Ibuka replies as follows:—

I cannot quite agree that the whole difficulty in California is economic. I am convinced that racial prejudice has a good deal to do with it And call it an economic problem if you will, or explain it as the clash between oriental and occidental civilisation, the root of the trouble is racial. . . . When Indians, who are British subjects, are not permitted free entrance to British territory, such as South Africa, Australia, and Canada, what is it but race prejudice?

He comes to the conclusion that it is a question "between the entire East and the entire West. It is a sacred question of humanity and can be permanently settled only by humanitarian methods." He states the position in plain words:

To-day Europe, the smallest of the five great continents of the earth, dominates the greater part of mankind. Europeans rule North and South America, the greater part of Africa, all Australia and New Zealand, as well as India and numerous islands of the sea. For the most part the white and the coloured races chance to be placed on opposite sides of the globe. (We should have said they are white and coloured because they chance to be placed on opposite sides of the globe. Ed. Comrade.) They (the whites) appear to wish to close their doors against the coloured races, yet, at the same time, wish to mingle with them. They want to have free course in the coloured man's country, but they don't want him to have free course in their country. This does not appeal to us at all as just.

If we now turn to Mr. Renton Denning we learn, nothing perhaps that even he thinks would satisfy any but a fool in India, but much of the science and the art of jumping over yawning gulfs of awkward questions. He says: "You do not find Occidentals 'claiming an inherent right to enter and reside in lands occupied by Asiatics.'" We rub our eyes and pinch ourselves to make sure we are not dreaming. But, no, it is all right. We are quite awake, and you shall see how Mr. Denning convinces you in your waking hours that all is maya. He goes on to say that "they (the Occidentals) do enter and do reside in such countries to some extent. "But"—now mark the ease of the practised jumper—"their presence," says Mr. Denning, "is based upon considerations apart from claims to inherent right." Wonderful, wasn't it? "It may be right conferred by treaty, or it may be right conferred by conquest, "but"—the leap again!—"on whatever grounds the right may be exercised, the conditions which ratify it and regulate it are acquiesced in by the country which receives the immigrants, tourists, travellers, officials, whatever they may be." It is not clear to us whether Mr. Renton Denning was smuggled into India by means of a vaguely worded treaty, possibly of the Amichand type, or stalked in as a conquering hero. Indian history in the eighteenth century was, if we may so call it, bewilderingly ambidextrous, and the distinction between treaties and conquests was no more clear than between meun and tuun on the Scotch Border when one of the Border Chiefs had as his motto "Thou shalt lack ere I lack." But however Mr. Denning may have come, the question is whether his right to remain here is ratified and regulated by the acquiescence of the country on which he was dumped. Well, the educated classes, whose one fault is that they are vocal, do not acquiesce unless he acquiesces in their "inherent right". There remain then only the "dumb millions"—and, as ill luck would have it, they are—why, of course, dumb!

Well, we do not know whether our phrases are "too carefully balanced" or not, but that is what comes inevitably of taking the "irresistible logic of the problem" as "the basis of our reasoning". It may or may not be some consolation to Mr. Renton Denning that, as he desired it, "the root of the matter" is now thoroughly "exposed"!

The Council of India Bill.

THE Bill introduced by Lord Crewe on the 25th May in the House of Lords, embodying certain important changes in the constitution and methods of work of the India Council, has naturally aroused a good deal of serious public discussion in this country. It closely follows the lines foreshadowed by his Lordship in his speech of 31st July, 1913, in the House of Lords. On that occasion he dealt in a general way with the need of reform in the methods of conducting business in the India Office and outlined his views in regard to the changes that he considered desirable. He said that the methods of conducting business had been the subject of discussion before he went to India Office in 1910. His own experience soon convinced him of the soundness of the general opinion "that the procedure of the Office in relation to India was intolerably cumbrous and dilatory." He referred to the peculiar features of the constitution of the India Office with an advisory council to assist the Secretary of State for India in the supervision and control of Indian affairs. This form of Government was definitely set up by an Act of Parliament in 1858. The Council originally consisted of 15 members whose salary was £1,200 a year. Apart from a general control over Indian expenditure, the functions of this body were deliberately made purely advisory with a view to maintain intact the responsibility of the Secretary of State. The authors of the Act of 1858 had mainly desired that the Council should devote its time to matters of policy and questions of first-rate importance. A practice, however, soon grew up under the Act of relegating to committees of the Council all matters of business great and small. Some unimportant changes in the details of procedure were effected in 1876 and 1889. A Bill was passed in 1907 which laid down that the Council should consist of not less than ten and not more than fourteen members, and the salaries of the members were reduced from £1,200 to £1,000 a year. The system has in other respects continued unaltered down to this day. Lord Crewe now proposes to make it more efficient and expeditious by introducing certain changes in the methods of work and constitution of the Council. His sole idea is "to improve and, so far as possible, perfect the machinery by which the daily and sometimes even hourly intercourse between those who represented the Imperial Government and those who controlled the actual Government was carried out."

The question of the India Council reform inevitably raises the still wider question whether a council of some sort is at all necessary to assist the Secretary of State in his task. The work of the India Office is quite different in scope and character from that of any other office in charge of Imperial affairs. It has to supervise and direct the government of diverse races differing from the English in history, language, religion and social practice, inhabiting a vast continent and dependent for their welfare on the will of an executive enjoying almost unlimited authority and power. An individual Minister in absolute control of such a gigantic and novel political transaction and responsible only to Parliament would not obviously constitute an ideal arrangement. A Secretary of State for India is generally a party leader who has risen to prominence in the British public life. He has no Indian experience and has usually a very hazy idea of the problems of Indian governance. Unless he is a man of exceptional intellectual gifts and strength of character he is liable to be overwhelmed by the bewildering variety and mass of the questions with which he has to deal single-handed. He may be content to leave everything to the unfettered choice of Indian Government, or may land affairs in a sorry mess by ignorantly interposing his authority at peculiarly inopportune moments. Generally speaking, therefore, a Secretary of State for India would derive considerable advantage by having at his side men possessing adequate knowledge of Indian affairs and competent to give useful advice. On a priori considerations the retention of an India Council seems to be necessary. It is, however, essential to bear in mind that the utility of the Secretary of State's Council depends ultimately on the character of its constitution and personnel. Unless its members are men of capacity and independence having real sympathy with Indian aspirations, the Council would be not only useless but also an instrument of potential mischief. In such a case it would be far safer to have no Council at all, and leave the Secretary of State to do his work alone without the help of a set of reactionary, obstructive or unsympathetic advisers. The vital thing is, therefore, to see what sort of India Council has hitherto existed at Whitehall and what possibilities of improvement are held out by the changes sought to be embodied in the recent Bill.

In theory the Secretary of State for India is, like other Ministers, responsible to Parliament, but in actual practice he is an autocrat wielding supreme authority in Indian affairs. The Council that was given to assist him by the Act of 1858 was expressly designed to be advisory. Its functions have remained unchanged since the day of its creation. It took its origin from the traditions connected with the management of Indian affairs by the East India Company. The old Court of Directors, whose abuse of power had roused the righteous ire of Burke, was abolished when after the Mutiny the Crown assumed the administration of India under a Secretary of State in Council. The change was, however, of little practical value, for the independent Parliamentary control, "exercised in a spirit of judicial impartiality", for which Burke had pleaded so eloquently, was not revived. As Sir William Wedderburn says in the Congress Green Book No. VI, dealing with the history and proposed reorganisation of the India Council, "the Council of the Secretary of State for India was little more than 'the old Court of Directors under a new name. This will be apparent 'when we remember that Mr. Burke's chief objection to the Directors 'was that they were the representatives of the Indian bureaucracy, which 'it was their duty to control. And exactly the same objection may be 'taken to the India Council, which is regularly recruited from the 'leading members of the Indian official class. In fact, it may be said 'that the last state of control is worse than the first. For, whereas 'the Court of Directors was filled with the nominees of the dominant 'Indian officials, the India Council is filled with these officials themselves'."

It would be interesting to recall the views held by prominent party leaders in England when the India Council was created by Act of Parliament. Referring to the debates on the Act of 1858, Lord Crewe said in the House of Lords that it was evident that there was a marked dread of the Government, and particularly of a single Minister, having uncontrolled power to spend the revenues of India, and also deep distrust of the patronage of India being handed over to a single individual. On the other hand, it was generally agreed that the functions of the Council should remain advisory and that the responsibility of the Secretary of State should be maintained. Lord Palmerston, who introduced the Government of India Bill No. 1, said that "the proposed Council must be a Council of advice, not a Council of control". He laid down the principle upon which a sensible man would select his advisers, saying that the Government "would wish to be advised by those most 'competent to give advice, and so far from choosing those most likely 'to be subservient and flexible, they would no doubt deem it 'their duty and their interest to select those who, by their knowledge, 'experience, talent and capacity, were most certain to prove useful 'assistants in the management of Indian affairs". Lord John Russell favoured "everything that can be done to preserve an independent character to the Council". Practically the same view was taken by Mr. Disraeli, who declared that the two great requisites for the Councillors were independence and knowledge. Sir Charles Wood laid down, as the guiding principle, that "if we are to govern India it must be for the benefit of the natives of that country." It is manifest, therefore that the statesmen primarily concerned with the creation of the India Council desired to make it a body of competent advisers, distinguished by their knowledge, experience, talent, capacity and independence of character, who would be prepared to make the welfare of India their first consideration. According to the originators of the Council the essential qualifications for Councillors are, as Sir William Wedderburn says, devotion to Indian interests, knowledge of Indian affairs, and independence.

The existing constitution of the Council does not apparently favour the selection of men who combine these qualifications in a marked degree. Ever since its creation it has been the close preserve mainly of the retired Indian administrators, who have stoutly maintained the bureaucrat's unbending attitude towards the real needs of India. Lord Morley, with his usual insight, realised the risks of this one-sided arrangement, and contrived to let some fresh air into the stuffy atmosphere of the Council by appointing two Indians as representatives of the non-official standpoint. The Council, as at present constituted, consists of ten members, of whom two are London bankers, two Indians, and the remaining six possess what is called the "Indian qualification." Lord Crewe now proposes to have a Council consisting of "such number of members, not less than seven nor more than ten, as the Secretary of State may from time to time determine." He desires to reduce the maximum number from 14 to 10 and the minimum number from 10 to 7. He thinks that for the practical working of the office a Council of eight would be adequate. The reduction in number is explained by the changes in the methods of work that have been embodied in the Bill. Briefly, the changes amount to the abolition of the system of work by committees of the Council except when such a procedure may be deemed desirable in deciding matters of moment. Under the present Bill, as amplified by the rules which the Secretary of State is empowered to make, various members of the Council will be attached to different departments of the India Office. They would co-operate with the permanent officials upon particular work. Lord Crewe hopes that thereby a great deal of business "which now went to committees and afterwards in a perfunctory way to Council, might be done directly by the departments, sometimes of course requiring the particular sanction of the Secretary of State."

We must say it at once that Lord Crewe's proposed "reforms" are in some respects alarming. With the ostensible object of making the Council efficient he seeks to introduce some very reactionary changes under the guise of this seemingly unpretentious Bill. He reduces the number of Councillors in order to do away with committee procedure, and he abolishes the committee system simply that members may get longer holidays than a "clergyman's fortnight" and thus the business of the office may be done with greater efficiency and despatch! Is he not aware that by abolishing weekly meetings of the Council and attaching each member to a particular department he would strike at the root of the advisory character of the Council? Will not such an arrangement be an expensive futility? To have the entire body of Councillors turned into so many more under-secretaries tied hopelessly to departmentalism is not a very gratifying prospect for the well-wishers of India. If the India Office is under-manned, increase the strength of its permanent staff by all means. But if its clerical and secretariat establishments are up to full working strength, one fails to see the wisdom of reducing Councillors to the status of glorified clerks, who would have rare occasions of meeting one another in Council and would spend most of their time in the usual routine of office. If Lord Crewe's "reforms" are carried in their original shape, the Secretary of State himself would soon fall a victim to departmentalism and the India Council would be strangled by red-tape. Was it for this fate that the originators had designed the Council?

Lord Crewe seeks through this Bill to enlarge almost indefinitely the scope of the powers of the Secretary of State which are reserved to him for "reasons of State." Lord Crewe is apparently of opinion that the area covered by the "Secret Department" requires extensive additions. This is perhaps the most reactionary aspect of the changes embodied in his Bill. One may understand the anxiety of the Government responsible for the Act of 1858,

i. e., of the year after the Mutiny, to arm the Secretary of State with exceptional powers to deal with certain contingencies without consulting his Council. But does any need for the exercise of secret and summary powers exist to-day? Have the contingencies provided for in the Act of 1858 grown in number and scope in recent years? Is the situation in India to-day as desperate as in the dark days of 1857? If so, why is it that no predecessor of Lord Crewe ever asked for his secret powers to be enhanced? Or is it that the need has begun to be felt since the inclusion of two Indian members? The fact is that Indian affairs, as a result of the general progress of the country in education and political thought and aptitude, have grown so complex that no Secretary of State should be entrusted to deal with any portion of them in a secret and summary way. He should be deprived of his power to send any secret orders and should be required to consult his advisers in all matters, big or small. It is just in dealing with questions "gravely affecting the internal tranquillity of India, or the interests of India in any other country," that the Secretary of State is liable to err, for he himself being generally ignorant of real circumstances, he is in all likelihood guided by the advice of "men on the spot". In all cases gravely affecting the internal tranquillity of India it is indispensable to ascertain the views of the Indian members of the Council. They alone are expected to know the full facts and represent the people's standpoint. If in the existing condition of India it should be possible for the Secretary of State to secretly order a deportation under the Regulation of 1818 or the promulgation of repressive measures without the knowledge of his Indian colleagues on the Council, their position at Whitehall as the Secretary of State's advisers is a mockery and a sham. It is far better to have no Council at all and no representatives of the Indian opinion tied to the tale of a Minister of the Crown who can find no use for them in "matters of moment".

Some of the far-sighted Indian publicists have often urged the abolition of the India Council altogether. They regard it as the only effective "reform", because they are of opinion, not unjustly, that the Council is a reactionary body packed with Anglo-Indian officials whose views and opinions had long since been stereotyped in bureaucratic environment and who retain little sympathy with Indian aspirations. If the personnel of the Council is to remain as provided for in the Bill, one may at last be driven to think that the total abolition of the Council would be a decided improvement on the existing system. The Bill provides for the inclusion of six members, including two Indians, having Indian experience, in a Council consisting of not more than ten nor less than seven members. Lord Crewe thinks a Council of eight members would be adequate. Taking eight, therefore, as the most probable figure, it is obvious that the Council would be composed of two Indians, four retired Anglo-Indian officials, one financial expert and one member probably taken from the ranks of British public men. The only satisfactory feature about this composition is that Indian members will be chosen from a number of persons elected by the Legislative Councils. But here, too, the Secretary of State's selection from a panel of elected Indians has been designed to dilute the principle of election and makes the concession almost worthless. In other respects the matters have not been improved by the Bill. And when the Council is practically shorn of its advisory character, one needs little persuasion to accept the alternative of having no Council at all. The Secretary of State as the sole undisputed arbiter of Indian destinies would be an infinitely simpler and better system of governing India than if he is given a so-called advisory Council, which will be asked to advise him when he pleases and in most important matters will be treated as if it never existed at all, which is to be split up into its individual components that would be asked to bury themselves up in the isolation of departments and be seldom free to emerge out of their trivial tasks and the common round of office. Lord Crewe started with an alluring promise to make a better use of his Council. Nothing would render it more effectually useless than the "reforms" embodied in his Bill.

Methought I heard a mighty voice proclaim,
In tones that taught my wavering heart to deem Man's sacred life a pure and silent stream
That glides through shine and shadow still the same—
"Wealth, Rank and Power, Grandeur, Glory, Fame,
Whose charms allure, are seldom what they seem;
They're but the phantoms of a feverish dream—
A gorgeous semblance with a pompous name."
I turned and saw a shadowy spectre glide
With folded arms, bent brow, and aspect grim;
It pointed—thus I knew the shade of him
Who played in mortal life a Titan's part—
Far to a bleak rock's billow-beaten side,
Where a chained eagle preyed on its own heart.

The Council of India Bill.

The following is the text of the Bill to amend the law as to the Council of India, which was introduced in the House of Lords by Lord Crewe on May 25 and read a first time:—

1.—(1) The Council of India constituted under the Government of India Act, 1858 (which Act as amended by any subsequent enactment is hereinafter referred to as the principal Act), shall consist of such number of members, not less than seven nor more than ten, as the Secretary of State may from time to time determine.

(2) Unless at the time when an appointment is made to fill a vacancy in the Council two at least of the then existing members of the Council were at the time of their appointment domiciled in India, the person appointed to fill the vacancy must be domiciled in India, and unless at such time as aforesaid six at least of the then existing members were at the time of their appointment either domiciled in India or were persons who had served or resided in India for at least ten years and had not ceased so to serve or reside more than five years before the date of their appointment, the person appointed to fill the vacancy must be either domiciled in India, or must have served or resided in India for at least ten years and have not ceased so to serve or reside more than five years before the date of his appointment.

The person appointed to fill a vacancy for which a person domiciled in India is alone eligible shall be selected from amongst the persons whose names appear on a list of persons domiciled in India chosen for the purpose by the members (other than official members) of the Legislative Councils of the Governor General, Governors, Lieutenant-Governors and Chief Commissioners, in such manner, subject to such conditions and restrictions, and in such number, as may be prescribed by regulations to be made by the Secretary of State in Council, or by directions issued by the Secretary of State thereunder.

(3) The yearly salary to be paid to a member of the Council shall be one thousand two hundred pounds, provided that such members appointed after the commencement of this Act who at the date of their appointment shall be domiciled in India shall be paid an additional yearly allowance of six hundred pounds.

(4) Where the Secretary of State is of opinion that a person possessing special qualification as a financial expert should be appointed to be a member of the Council on special terms, he may, after recording in a minute to be laid before Parliament the special reasons for the appointment and the special terms on which the appointment is to be made, make the appointment and the person so appointed shall, notwithstanding anything in the principal Act, or this Act, hold office for such term and on such conditions, and shall in respect thereof be entitled to such salary and to such pension, and other rights and privileges (if any) as His Majesty may, by order in Council, in each case determine.

Provided that not more than one person appointed under this provision shall be a member of the Council at the same time.

2.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in section nineteen of the principal Act, it shall not be necessary for an order or communication sent to India or an order in the United Kingdom in relation to the government of India to be signed by a Secretary of State in such cases as the Secretary of State in Council may otherwise direct, but every such order and communication shall purport to be made by Secretary of State in Council.

(2) For section twenty of the principal Act (which relates to the powers of the Secretary of State to divide the Council into committees, and to regulate the transaction of business in Council) the following section shall be substituted:—

"It shall be lawful for the Secretary of State in Council to make rules and orders for the transaction of business as regards the powers which under the principal Act are to be exercised by the Secretary of State in Council:

"Provided that any such rules or order, so far as it affects any matter or question in respect of which the concurrence of a majority at a meeting of the Council is required by this Act, shall not be valid unless made with the concurrence of a majority of the members of Council present at the meeting of Council at which the rule or order is passed."

(3) Such rules and orders as aforesaid may, notwithstanding anything in sections twenty-two, twenty-four, twenty-five, and twenty-six of the principal Act, provide, as respects such matters as may be specified in the rules and orders—(a) for enabling powers of the Secretary of State in Council to be exercised otherwise than at a meeting of the Council, and, where necessary for that purpose, for dispensing with any requirement of the principal Act as to the concurrence of the majority of votes of members of Council; (b) for dispensing with the necessary of submitting to Council or depositing in the Council Room for the perusal of members, orders and communications proposed to be sent to India or to be made in the United Kingdom by the Secretary of State, and of recording and notifying to members of Council the grounds on which any order or communication to India has been treated as urgent.

(4) At a meeting of the Council the quorum shall be three, and meetings of the Council shall be convened and held when and as the Secretary of State may from time to time direct.

(5) Any document required by the principal Act to be signed by two or more members of the Council, either with or without the countersignature of the Secretary of State, or one of his Under Secretaries or Assistant Under Secretaries, may be signed in such manner as the rules and orders made by the Secretary of State in Council for the transaction of business in his Council may prescribe, and any such document, if signed in accordance with such rules and orders, shall be as valid as if it had been signed in accordance with the provisions of the principal Act.

(6) Section twenty-seven of the principal Act (which enables the Secretary of State to send certain secret orders without communicating them to the members of his Council) shall extend to any order not being an order in respect of which concurrence of a majority at the meeting of the Council is required by the principal Act, which relates to any question gravely affecting the internal tranquillity of India, or the interests of India in any other country, or the peace or security of any part of His Majesty's Dominions, and which in the opinion of the Secretary of State is of the nature to require secrecy, and it is further declared that the said section shall apply to any order which the Secretary of State may send in reply to a despatch received and dealt with by him under section twenty-eight of the principal Act.

(7) All rules and orders made under this section shall be laid before Parliament as soon as may be after they are made, and if an address is presented to His Majesty by either House of Parliament within the next subsequent thirty days on which that House has sat after any such rule or order is laid before it praying that the rule or order may be annulled His Majesty in Council may annul the rule or order, and it shall henceforth be void but without prejudice to that validity of anything previously done thereunder.

8.--(1) This Act may be cited as the Council of India Act, 1914.

(2) The enactments mentioned in the schedule to this Act are hereby repealed to the extent specified in third column of that schedule: namely, the Government of India Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict. c. 106), sections ten, thirteen, twenty and twenty-two, from the beginning to "shall be present" and from "meetings of the Council shall be convened" to the end of the section: and the Council of India Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII, c. 35), sections one, two, and three.

An Open Letter.

To the Rt. Hon. the Marquis of Crewe, K.C., His Majesty's Secretary of State for India.

MY LORD.—As editor-proprietor of the Daily Zamindar, which is one of the leading exponents of the views of the bulk of the Muslim Indian population, permit me to trespass for a while on your Lordship's indulgence with a brief statement of the latest attitude adopted by the Executive authorities towards the Daily Zamindar, affecting as it does the whole problem of the freedom of the vernacular Press. It is my firm conviction that, conscious of the high destiny of Great Britain in Asia, your Lordship and the other statesmen who are responsible for the government of the Indian Empire, are genuinely anxious that the people of India should be happy, prosperous, and contented, and should have their just grievances promptly redressed. It is this belief which encourages me to approach your Lordship on behalf of the freedom of the Press, which is a matter of as great concern to His Britannic Majesty's Indian subjects as to their British fellow-subjects.

As your Lordship knows, English can never be the language of the Indian masses, but only of a small minority of persons who have received, or may in future receive, an English education mainly for purposes of being associated with the administration of the country. The bulk of the population must continue to use the native languages. To Great Britain is due the everlasting credit of having given official support and recognition to a language which is the only possible substitute for a common medium of expression in India. It was due to this wise measure that Urdu became the written and spoken language of Northern India, and the Esperanto of every other part of the country; and if the new life with which India is pulsating has found its intellectual manifestation in a daily expanding vernacular press, of which the Urdu section is by far the most important, it is only in the fitness of things that such should be the case. A new spirit is in the air. In common with the rest of the struggling communities of the world, India is in the process of a mental and moral transformation: new ideas, new aspirations, new susceptibilities influencing the minds of millions imperceptibly yet inevitably. This superabundance of fresh energy must find expression somehow or other if the community is to continue in a state of normal health. And what more fitting outlet for this exuberance of newly acquired vitality can be than the vernacular Press? Choke this outlet and you will have shut the safety-valve. The body politic will become afflicted with internal abscesses, dripping with a thousand venomous humors. The ruling caste, barred from intercourse with the people by reason of their insular aloofness and want of proper knowledge of the language of the country, will have to depend for information as to the real temper of the people upon a host of paid spies or unscrupulous sycophants. Such a state of affairs would be disastrous.

I have constantly tried to subordinate journalism, ever since I adopted this profession five years ago, to the policy laid down by the Supreme Government. The Indian Government is a human institution, and as such is susceptible of defects and errors of judgment. In common with the rest of my fellow-journalists, I have claimed the right to criticise official errors with a view to securing their rectification. This claim is based upon our intimate association with the traditions of England, and, to use the figurative expression of Lord Morley since our incorporation in the system of British citizenship, it is as old as Runnymede. Of late, however, there has been a marked tendency on the part of a section of officials in India to resent the independent spirit shown in perfectly honest, constitutional newspaper criticism. It is this attitude to which I beg respectfully to draw your Lordship's attention in the earnest hope that prompt measures will be taken to safeguard the freedom of the Indian Press in the interests both of the people and the Empire.

In February 1910, when the Indian Press Act was being hurried through the Viceroy's Legislative Council, on the plea that the measure was necessary for the extermination of anarchism, no one could have positively asserted that it was destined in the near future to be employed for the suppression of the freedom of religious and political thought of the most innocuous character. Yet the scores of paper and presses which have been dealt with under this stern law during the past two years show that the worst fears of the early critics of the Press Act have been more than realised. It could not have been anticipated that a criticism of the revenue policy of the Government, a presentation of the case of the poverty-stricken peasantry, a statement of the religious grievances of the people, would come under the provisions of the Press Act, all embracing as they are. Nevertheless, articles in the Daily Zamindar devoted purely to such matters have been treated as objectionable for the purposes of the Press Act, as the following letter* addressed to me by the District Magistrate of Lahore will show.

Mr. Tollinton's letter, which bears on it the impress of inspiration from higher quarters, harsh as it is, is an agreeable departure from the usual procedure in one respect. To journalists who were accustomed to receive, without the slightest warning, notices of forfeiture of existing securities and of imposition of fresh ones as a punishment for writings which had incurred official displeasure, without the opportunity of a protest or a defence, it is, indeed, a relief. The new system inaugurated by Mr. Tollinton's letter, however undesirable in many respects, as the advocates of the freedom of the Press will readily appreciate, has at least the advantage of affording us the chance of removing many deplorable misunderstandings. To misunderstandings of this character is due in a large number of cases the harsh treatment meted out to the vernacular Press; and I am sure a mild reproof, a friendly warning, or call for a proper explanation would have spared the Government the regrettable necessity of suppressing many a journal. Circumstanced as the Indian officials are in view of their conceptions of personal prestige, it is extremely difficult for them to set aside an executive verdict when once it has been issued, even though it may be subsequently established that there has been an error in judgment, perhaps because of the defective data supplied to them by incompetence, inadvertence, or even personal interest. The cases of the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Bara are instances in point. These two Muslim papers have each been required to pay a security of three thousand rupees on the plea that they had brought the Christian subjects of His Majesty into hatred and contempt.

Now I am sure the Punjab Government at the time of punishing the Bara was unaware that the article which formed the ground for the Government order had appeared more than eighteen months ago in Annajm, a theological paper of Lucknow; that during these long months it had never occurred to the Christian subjects of His Majesty that the Muslim interpretation of the "Incarnation of Jesus Christ," in which orthodox Muslims reposed the same faith as orthodox Christians, could ever bring them into hatred and contempt; and that the U.P. Government, whose campaign against offending journalists has not erred on the side of leniency, had not thought it worth their while to bring Annajm to book. Similarly, I feel convinced that the official in the Punjab Secretariat, whose business it is to lay the Press Act whip on the back of outspoken journalists, did not know at the time of drafting the order in respect of the Ahl-i-Hadees that Muslims believe in Jesus Christ as one of the greatest messengers of God, any disrespectful mention of whom renders a Muslim liable to be branded as a blasphemer; but that, as they do not believe in the Atonement, the paper was simply expressing the Muslim doctrine; and that, therefore, to the seventy-five millions of Indian Muslims any action of the Punjab Government against the Ahl-i-Hadees on the score that it had refused to accept the doctrine of the Atonement to be the teaching of Christ, would appear as nothing but a flagrant violation of the pledge of religious neutrality. Had the officials known all these facts they would have hesitated to commit themselves to a course of action in respect of the Ahl-i-Hadith and the Badr, which has secured for them the sympathy of the whole of India as victims of official intolerance. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary that so long as the Press Act remains on the Statute Book, the greatest circumspection should be exercised by the officials in taking any action under the Act which is to be placed in the category of their obiter dicta.

* The letter referred to has already appeared in these columns. Ed. Comrade.

Mr. Tollinton's letter to my address is a remarkable document in many respects. It shows that the Press Act is now going to be employed for censoring perfectly bona-fide and honest criticism on the ever-ready plea that it is intended to stir up agitation among the ignorant masses. It arrogates to itself the task of lecturing the editor of a responsible paper in harsh, dictatorial and intimidatory language on his suppositions journalistic sins, and does not permit the scores of rival newspapers—Anglo-Indian, Hindu and Muslim—to detect his "mischievous inaccuracies," if there were any, and to denounce him accordingly. It is full of erroneous assumptions, which are based upon a distorted English version of the original articles; and the central idea dominating the whole letter—viz., that the articles objected were so much "veiled treason"—is derived from a few isolated and disjointed phrases or words in utter disregard of their context. In one word, the articles in question, instead of appealing to the authorities as respectful representations of a loyal journalist, who is an out-and-out believer in Pax Britannica, are treated as the dangerous fulminations of a sedition-monger. The object of these lines is to prove to your Lordship that such an illusion does exist, and that it has its source in the inability of the officials to understand our language, which has to be interpreted to them by a staff of underpaid translators who are mostly incompetent.

Urdu, having Sanskrit grammar and more than 50 per cent. of Perso-Arabic vocabulary, is very difficult to translate into English, and to bring out the spirit of the original when rendering some elegant passage of Urdu belles lettres requires a perfect mastery of both languages, which very few people possess. When, therefore, the loyalty of a person has to be determined by one single phrase, one solitary word, and he has to be adjudged a faithful subject of His Majesty or a traitorous seditionist according to the shade of meaning conveyed by that particular phrase or word, it is high time that the officials adopting this Draconian standard should see that the phrase or word in question shall not only be accurately rendered, but that it also will be interpreted in the light of its context. That flagrant injustice is done to journalists by attributing to them views and sentiments which they never expressed is abundantly evident from Mr. Tollinton's letter. The writer in the Daily Zamindar respectfully appeals to the Government on behalf of the dumb agricultural masses, and with the customary oriental courtesy uses the following poetic language:—

"Thou hast showered down upon others flowers and even fruits;
O giver-away of orchards, grant me also some boon, I pray thee."

For the sake of literary brevity only the second line of the couplet used as an elegant allusion, but the Provincial Government, as Mr. Tollinton's letter shows, interprets the line as follows: "O destroyer of the garden root and branch, throw something to this side also." Evidently this is a sample of the "veiled treason" of the vernacular press, to which the Standard refers in its review of the speech of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, recently delivered in the Punjab Legislative Council.

The Government translating staff, which has given this glaring proof of its incapacity to translate Urdu poetry, supplies Mr. Tollinton with further material of a similar kind, which has led him to assert that the Daily Zamindar has mischievously misquoted a speech from Lord Morley with the object of fanning the fanaticism of the ignorant masses. Mr. Tollinton's complaint is that the word "exposed" has been used in a deprecatory sense. Now, in order to be able to affirm with any degree of assurance that the rendering of the Daily Zamindar was not in consonance with the precise significance of the word as used by Lord Morley, it was necessary that Mr. Tollinton should know Urdu, the language in which the Daily Zamindar is written. But he has to depend upon the translators, with the result that Lord Morley's words, which had been correctly translated into Urdu by the Daily Zamindar, are retranslated into the translator's English, and the responsibility for this inaccurate language is, as usual, foisted on to the Daily Zamindar.

Mr. Tollinton has been led to draw many strange inferences from the leading articles of the Daily Zamindar which appeared in its issues of February 25, 26, 27 and 28 last. He gratuitously assumes that the British Government has been described as an alien Government which has destroyed the nationality and religion of the people over whom it rules, and has been compared unfavourably with Russia, the Balkan States, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and the Philippine Islands. Here again the incorrigible translators have caused Mr. Tollinton to do the grossest injustice to the Daily Zamindar. The fact is, it never described the British Government as such, and never instituted any disadvantageous contrast. Its point was that even the most tyrannical and barbarous Governments had respected and tolerated the law of Islam under which Muslims were governed elsewhere, and it would be monstrous to suppose that a just and constitutional Government as the British Government would fail to concede our just and reasonable demands if we pressed them in a proper manner. This attitude is abundantly clear from the opening lines of the leading article dated February 27, which run thus:—

"It is a constitutional Government. Its laws are just. It never tolerates injustice intentionally. Muslims acknowledge it to be a Muslim Government; Hindus regard it as a Raj of their own faith; while, in the opinion of the bulk of the population, it is superior and very much superior to both Muslim and Hindu Governments."

The article then reproduces the trenchant criticisms of the Pioneer and the Englishman on the "Official Secrets Bill," comments on the repressive nature of the Press Act, refers to the budget-speech delivered by Lord Morley in 1906, and winds up with the following characteristic remarks:—

"Whatever its shortcomings, the people of India are attached to the British Government, and we hold the view that it is the sacred duty of every child of the soil to be firmly attached and devoted to the Crown. But the question is whether the stability of the British Government does not rest upon the maintenance and integrity of the two basic components of the British constitution—viz. the Legislature and the Executive. Is it not expedient that, while preserving its prestige intact, efforts should be made to make the Government universally popular by suggesting proper measures of reform."

It is a discussion of these measures in the most respectful language which has disturbed the equanimity of Mr. Tollinton and his chief, Sir Michael O'Dwyer. A bureaucracy, which can afford to spend £16,000,000 sterling or thereabout in creating a new Delhi, but cannot provide a few millions for free primary education demanded by the combined voice of India; which pays 80 lakhs of rupees per annum to 8,000 European officials, but disburses a paltry 71 lakhs to 131,000 Indians; which permits Messrs. Black & Sons to publish in India their notorious geographical work full of vitriolic attacks on the nationality and character of Indians, but places an embargo on a translation of "Come over into Macedonia and help us," dealing with the savage treatment of Muslims by the Balkan States; which, in direct contravention of the laws of the realm, interdicts a time honoured religious observance, the rite of sacrifice, and forbids all adverse criticism on the part of the parties affected by this arbitrary order; must not be surprised if a protest is entered against its actions. The Daily Zamindar refers to all these grievances in the belief that constitutionally the British Government, as distinguished from the Anglo-Indian oligarchy administering India, is not responsible for them, and that as soon as their true nature is brought home to the Imperial statesmen everything would be put right. Among other things it has discussed the rates of the land revenue obtaining in modern India as compared with those levied under Muslim Governments in former times. It has shown on the authority of Lord Morley that the maximum rate levied by the British Government in India is 65 per cent., and pointed out by way of contrast that the Muslim land revenue has from the earliest times been based upon the principle that the Government should take one-tenth of the produce of the land, leaving nine-tenths to the cultivators. The contrast is certainly unfavourable to the British Government, but the Daily Zamindar takes the sting out of the comparison by reminding its readers that "we must not be unfair to the Government, for its expenditure is very great, and without this increase it cannot possibly make up the deficit in its budget." It further assures the poor peasants, whose lot is really to be pitied, that "we must not lose heart, as our Government shares our joys and our sorrows. It will spontaneously introduce reforms and alleviate the sufferings of those who are in distress. England! then has always been a protector of the weak. Help us, for we are weak."

In this spirit of humility the Punjab Government sees lurking the dark shadow of treason. Mr. Tollinton, who is obsessed with the one idea that everything that the Editor of the Daily Zamindar says or writes is intended to mislead people and arouse feeling against the Government, thinks that the sentiments of devotion above expressed will stir up agitation among the ignorant masses. He questions the authenticity of the statement made by the Daily Zamindar that the "Muslim Governments claimed one-tenth of the produce of the land, leaving nine-tenths to the cultivators," and so far forgets his duty to himself as an English gentleman of polished manners as to call it an "untruth." He then calls upon the Editor, under commands from the Lieutenant-Governor, to publish an extract from Abul Fazl's Ain-i-Akbari, "which shows that the Mughal system at its best under Akbar, following the system of Nousherwan, took one-third of the produce." Finally, he threatens the Daily Zamindar with what looks like another forfeiture of security, or something even worse, if it refused to publish the extract in question. The extract has, of course, been published, with a comprehensive reply calculated to allay the totally uncalled-for suspicions of the Punjab Government. But, apart from the problematic issues raised by the British land revenue system as compared with the systems of empires long dead and gone, I venture to ask your Lordship whether the vexatious and quibbling spirit manifested in Mr. Tollinton's letter is worthy of a great and dignified Government so jealous of its prestige? The objections raised by Mr. Tollinton are, as your Lordship will have been pleased to observe, so petty, so pultry, that they are not worth the paper on which they are written; and on behalf of Indian journalism I crave your Lordship's protection against such vexatious treatment in the future.

Your Lordship knows that we Indians, irrespective of whether we are Muslim or Hindu, are proud of our connection with England, and our only political ambition is that our position as the integral elements of the Empire should be duly recognised. If India is going to remain a part of the British Empire indefinitely, her just and reasonable aspirations will have to be treated with greater consideration. A new class of men who have imbibed British notions of justice and freedom has sprung up. The very atmosphere of India is charged with the new ideas which the civilisation of Britain has imported to the East. We demand that we should be treated as British citizens. We demand that so long as we are true to the British flag, and are prepared to defend the supremacy of England in India against the world, we should be regarded as freeborn men. If Mr. William Digby can write "Prosperous British India," and yet remain loyal to the British Government; if Mr. Thorburn can make his famous pro-zamindar speech at Simla and still continue to be a well-wisher of the State; if Sir Edward Carson can even smuggle arms and ammunition into Ulster with the object of using it against the King's troops and still retain his seat in the House of Commons; if Mr. Rudyard Kipling, the quondam Sub-Editor of the Civil and Military Gazette of Lahore, can call Mr. Asquith and his illustrious colleagues "murderers," "swindlers," "liars," and "thieves," and, in the words of that paper, yet remain entitled to "the position he occupies as an instructor of the public"—I venture to think that the Editor of the Daily Zamindar, who is as much a subject of King George as any of these gentlemen, has at least the right of advocating the cause of his fellow-countrymen in humble and respectful language, without incurring the false charge that he is doing his "best to stir up agitation among the ignorant masses by misrepresentation and misquotation which might have mischievous results."

We Indians, who have borrowed our conceptions of journalistic amenities from the English newspaper world, do not lay claim when criticising the Government to follow the example of the Daily Telegraph, which has been speaking of the Ministers of the Crown in the following language:—

"Their whole course of action is an unutterable infamy. . . . This question of the relation of the army to the civil authority would never have arisen but for the Government's own stupendous blunders, the consequences of which they are now striving vainly to escape by a stream of cowardly insinuations against the very man whom they have injured. . . . Ministers who utter such pernicious and poisonous nonsense at such a crisis are not fit for the back benches of a suburban debating society. . . . These pledge-bound Ministers who have sworn on oath to commit the foulest treason against democracy that a Government ever conceived are entangled in the nets of their own making."

Like the Daily Mail, another pillar of the Fourth Estate, we do not ask for the unbridled license of calling Mr. Asquith a "bully," and expressing the "probability that a plot will be revealed, the disclosure of which, in a famous phrase of Sir Edward Grey's, will bring the Government to death, disaster, and damnation."

Owing to our peculiar temperament, we have too much respect for constituted authority to imitate the example of yet another representative of British public opinion, the Pall Mall Gazette, which sets us the following example of what newspaper criticism of Government can be:—"The situation has become intolerable with a Ministry shamed and convicted, growing in malignancy as it declines in power. . . . Englishmen must look with less pity than contempt on the wild efforts of the Government to keep their balance in 'slippery places' by clutching at dirty handholds. Every day adds a fresh chapter to the story of treachery, failure and evasion. Each morning finds their credit more depreciated and their public honour more deeply soiled. . . . Hence the transformation from bully to juggler, the dental extraction of one damning fact after another, the explanations, and explanations of explanations that leave the country with a suffocating sense of bad faith and a universal impression of false coin. . . . Selfish and guilty fear is the only state of mind that will fully explain the wild rushes and collisions of their subsequent procedure."

We do not want to follow even in the footsteps of Anglo-Indian journalism as represented by the Statesman, which, flinging Section 4 of the Press Act in the teeth of its administrators, speaks of the "cruelty and folly" of the "interested" Viceroy, who is "wasting the resources of a comparatively poor people upon a luxurious toy," meaning the new Delhi.

No, we Indians have much too great a respect for our sense of propriety and decorum to abuse and denounce the Government in this frantic, irresponsible way. All we want is that we should not be called upon to pay a crushing fine when we happen to point out conclusively to the Government that their officials have recklessly demolished one of our temples; that our presses should not be confiscated when we casually suspect the moral rectitude of Piccadilly; that we should not be regarded as the enemies of England if we indulge in that hackneyed platitude that as compared with England India is poor; and that we should not be accused of "veiled treason" when we have only appealed to the liberality of the Government by crying out:—

"O giver-away of orchards grant me some boon, I pray thee."

In conclusion, while apologising for the inordinate length of this representation, I beg to draw your Lordship's attention to one outstanding fact. The past three years have synchronised with a period of unprecedented stress and storm in the annals of Islam. Outside India a series of the most awful catastrophes has befallen Muslim countries, shaking to its very foundation the integrity of Islam as a factor in world politics. While these calamities were producing convulsions of sympathy throughout the length and breadth of Muslim India, an incident occurred within India itself which went like a dagger through the heart of the Muslim community. The Daily Zamindar, in common with other organs of Muslim opinion, had its share in determining the temper of the community. Like a mirror it faithfully reflected their hopes and their fears, the poignance of their anguish and the strength of their determination to do nothing which might sully their traditional devotion to the Crown. When it looks back to the past it finds itself in the proud position of exclaiming with the rest of the Muslim Press that not one solitary instance can be cited in which anything was done by the Muslim community, severally or collectively, as a result of newspaper activity, to merit the slightest reproach. Even the Viceroy, in receiving the Muslim Deputation, admitted as much. Is it not rather late in the day for the Punjab Government, now that peace has been established in Europe and Asia, and normal conditions have been resumed in India, to accuse the Daily Zamindar of doing its best to stir up agitation among the ignorant masses by mischievous misrepresentation? Circumstanced as Indian journalists are, in view of their inability to retort in the vigorous language of the Daily Telegraph or the Statesman, it is cruel of the Punjab Government to apply such uncalled-for and unjustifiable remarks to me as "mischievous" and "autrue" and as being actuated by a desire to "arouse feelings against Government." Against these gratuitous insults I crave once more your Lordship's protection.

Trusting that the liberal traditions that your Lordship has inherited from all that is good and lovable in England will impel you to grant His Britannic Majesty's helpless Indian subjects greater scope in expressing their innermost thoughts as required by the British Constitution.

I have the honour to remain, my Lord, your most devoted servant,

ZAFAR ALI KHAN,

Editor of the Daily Zamindar (Lahore),

India and the Empire.

THE Times has published the following letter from Mrs. Annie Besant:—

Outside the domestic problems of Ulster and the women's war Great Britain is faced with two problems in the East which will tax to the utmost her political sagacity, and it is not too much to say that her success or failure in building a world-Empire will depend on the fashion of their solution.

The first is that of Indian emigration, and the right of Indians to travel freely throughout the Empire and to settle in it where they will. This chiefly affects the labouring classes of the vast Indian population, seeking an outlet for subsistence abroad, since many of the home industries have ceased to be life-supporting; to some extent their difficulties in gaining a livelihood in India may be diminished by the demand for labour in tea, coffee, and other plantations, where wages tend to rise in consequence of the scarcity of coolies and by the improvement of village life by the spread of co-operation and the revival of weaving and other handicrafts. These remedial tendencies are, however, inevitably slow in their action, and the area over which they must spread for effective usefulness is so huge that, while they may slightly lessen they cannot obviate the necessity for emigration in search of livelihood. The educated class is touched by the question of the emigration of the labouring population mainly through sentiment—the feelings of kinship with those immediately affected, of indignation against unfair treatment meted out to fellow-countrymen, of race-pride smarting under the imputation of inferiority. The late agitation in India over the South African troubles—that had to danger-point when Lord Hardinge's statesman-like sympathy saved the situation by associating the Government with the popular feeling—joined all classes together for the first time in a national protest, and made India feel her strength as a united people; its practical success in gaining a large measure of relief is hailed as a sign that Indian public opinion is no longer voiceless and impotent, and that Indian public opinion is no longer voiceless and impotent, and that Indian feeling can be affectively aroused in defence of Indian interests. To the educated class this question of emigration is only part of the larger problem—the position of Indians in the Empire as inferiors or as equals; and it is this second question which is greatly the more important, although the emigration may seem to be more immediately pressing.

THE IDEAL OF LIBERTY.

Since the famous educational minute of Lord Macaulay, England has steadily held up before the eyes of the youths receiving English education in Government schools and colleges the ideals of English liberty, English constitutional government, English systems of local and national self-rule; she has aroused Indian admiration for her ordered freedom, for her warm sympathy with autocratically governed nations when they strove to win their liberty, for her shelter of political refugees, and her refusal to surrender to infuriated Government those who had taken sanctuary on her soil after the commission of political crimes. Several generations of Indians have grown up in the belief that England loved liberty, that when she saw political unrest she advised rulers to seek its causes and to remove them that repression of the voicing of complaints was folly, as it merely increased discontent by driving it under the surface, and further, that the repressive policy only deprived the Government of the advantage of knowing what its subjects were thinking, and thus of remedying grievances which might cause serious danger when concealed.

The events of the last few years have inflicted a rude shock on these beliefs: Indians who have been taught the value of liberty, that "taxation without representation is robbery," that "Government rests on the will of the people," find that what England treasures for herself she refuses to them. And they find, with still greater pain, that England, face to face with political crimes, adopts all the methods she has hitherto blamed in others—repression of free speech, prohibition of public meetings, securities from the Press forfeited by the arbitrary will of the Executive, house-searchings by the police, deportation without trial, detention in prison without trial, proclamation of districts entailing the necessity of obtaining permission for any public meeting, police espionage, &c., Russian methods used by free England and the forfeiture of the freedom of all law-abiding people because a few desperadoes have committed crimes. No one who does not live as a friend among Indians can know the deep resentment felt by them against such methods employed by a country they loved and admired. The suspicion of their loyalty shown by Government has bred suspicion in them, and there is a widening gulf between the officials and the educated class.

The growing sense of self-respect, of patriotism, and of public spirit, fostered by English education and by contact with Englishmen, will no longer accept benevolent patronage with gratitude; Indians demand to be treated as equals, and not as a "subject race"; they refuse to regard colour as a disqualification for any office in a coloured nation, and demand that Queen Victoria's proclamation of 1858—India's Magna Charta, as they fondly call it—shall no longer remain a dead letter. The best men are standing out of Government service because they will not tolerate supersession by Englishmen inferior to themselves, merely on the ground of colour, and because they will not subject themselves to arrogance and discourtesy. They say frankly that the best men no longer come out to India, whether as Judges, civilians, or professors, and that fifth-rate Englishmen should not be preferred to first-rate Indians. They claim at least equality in Government service, and some say that where qualifications are equal the Indian should be preferred in his own country to the foreigner. Government service will be increasingly manned by an inferior class of Indians unless conditions are altered and colour ceases to be regarded as a mark of inferiority.

I leave aside here questions of social difficulties: the exclusion of Indians from clubs, the insults often offered to them if they travel first class on railways, the refusal to admit them to railway bedrooms at night, the readiness to strike men of the lower classes and even sometimes of the higher, the light punishments inflicted where a blow or a kick causes death, the keeping of Indian gentlemen waiting in verandahs sometimes for hours when they visit officials—a whole long list of social affronts which cause unending bitterness. The Indians say that social equality will only come with political equality, and I believe they are right.

POLITICAL DEMANDS.

Their political demands are easily formulated. The National Congress and the Muslim League both demand self government—self government within the Empire. They demand that the representation granted by the Minto-Morley reforms shall be made effective, by not outnumbering the representatives on the Supreme and Provincial Legislatures with official members; the representatives are in a perpetual minority, and can only criticise, they cannot legislate. Gradually, all members of such bodies should be elected, and the Government should be responsible to the Legislature.

The Press Act must be abolished, and Press criticism must not be regarded as sedition. The sweeping clauses of the Act can catch legitimate criticism within the net of sedition, and every Indian editor lives under the sword of Damocles. The promise of protection by the revision of the High Court has proved to be a delusion, and amendment at least should be granted if abolition be refused.

Indian candidates for the Services should be placed on an equality with English ones by the establishment of simultaneous examinations; at present the Imperial Services, which give higher social position and higher pay—the Civil Service, the Medical, the Educational, the Bar, the Engineering—can only be entered by residence in England. When the youths come over to England they find difficulties placed in their way; the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge restrict admission, the Medical colleges are doing the same, the Bar has raised the conditions of admission, the Institute of Engineers demands higher qualifications from the Indian than from the English students.

The separation of the executive and judicial functions of the magistrates is needed for the fair administration of justice; counsel, witnesses, litigants have to follow an inconsiderate magistrate who fixes a place 20 miles away for a hearing, to suit his convenience for other work. The unfairness is admitted, but no remedy is found.

Representation on the India Council is asked for, and this will probably be granted, though to a lesser degree than is asked.

Now that there is talk of federating the Empire, this question of India becomes pressing. Great Britain, Ireland the Colonies, are spoken of as federated countries; India is always left out. If she is shut out of the Empire as a self-governing country, will she be to blame if she refuses to remain in it as a dependency? If her sons are shut out of the Colonies, will she be to blame if she shuts out all colonials? If the white man lords it over the Asiatic outside Asia, shall not the Asiatic be at least his own master within Asia? The educated Indian is a highly cultured, courteous, noble-hearted, patriotic gentleman; is he always to be shut out from the best in his own country? Is he never to be free among free men? Is he never to be estimated by his character, his brain, and his heart, but always by the colour of his skin? There is no finer class in the Empire than that composed of the educated Indians. They offer an intelligent loyalty, the loyalty of citizens and of free men. Will it be for the Empire if it rejects their love and disregards their loyalty. For India is awakened into national self-consciousness, and her tie with Great Britain can only be preserved by her freedom. Free, she will be the buttress of the Empire; subject, she will be a perpetual menace to its stability.

Lord Kitchener's Report on Egypt.

THE CAPITULATIONS.

Very brief reference is made to the Mixed Tribunals and the Capitulations. In the concluding paragraphs of the Introduction we read:—

I have little to add to the remarks which I made last year on the subject of the Mixed Tribunals, though, so far as procedure is concerned, I am glad to be able to note that some little progress has been made of late. In my immediately preceding report I was able to record the introduction of certain reforms in the procedure for the recovery of mortgage debts, and for the seizure and sale of land in execution proceedings. Some further improvements in procedure, of a more general character, were effected in the past year. A new law has abolished certain dilatory proceedings, by means of which unscrupulous debtors were enabled to delay their creditors and retard the payment of their debts. The same law has

Also restricted third-party claims in execution proceedings, reduced delays in the service of writs, amended the regulations as to costs, and introduced some other minor reforms in the existing system.

But the main question of organisation remains unsolved. Nor am I able to foresee the possibility of effecting any radical improvement in a situation the faults of which are inherent in the existing system of the "Capitulations." The fundamental modification of this system has been urged in the annual reports emanating from this Agency for many years past, and it may be hoped that a settlement of the question will not now be much longer delayed.

PUBLIC HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

The Public Health Department receives much attention in the Introduction. It is noted that the Lunacy Section has been made into a separate Department, and that the Veterinary Section has been handed over to the Ministry of Agriculture, which will give the P.H.D. a "freer hand and more time to deal with problems appertaining to the health of the people."

The Ophthalmic Division has been strengthened by the addition of two inspecting surgeons, so that, in addition to the director, there is now a staff of four inspecting surgeons and thirty hospital surgeons.

So far as the central organisation is concerned, a Board of Health, composed of five members with the Director-General of the Public Health Department as president, is being formed. It is to be a consultative and advisory body without executive duties. The opinion of this Board will be taken on all important subject.

These additions and changes will enable the Public Health Department to take up the investigation of the more prevalent diseases, such as ankylostomiasis and bilharziasis, which are so widely disseminated through the Delta, and cripple so large a percentage of the population, thus seriously affecting the economic condition of an agricultural country like Egypt. The ova of bilharziasis have been recently discovered in the tissues of mummies of the Twentieth Dynasty, and it is therefore high time that serious steps should be taken to prevent the continuity of infection that has been going on so long in this country. Pellagra, infectious eye diseases generally such as acute ophthalmia and trachoma, typhus fever, and other kindred diseases, and the causes of the abnormally high rate of infantile mortality, will all be subjected to a most careful examination.

HEALTH IN THE VILLAGES.

The remarks upon the sanitary—or insanitary—condition of the average Egyptian village are full of interest:—

In the villages throughout the country we find conditions favourable to the life history of the parasites giving rise to such diseases as ankylostomiasis and bilharziasis, which depend for their spread on conditions of soil and water and insanitary surroundings such as are usually found in this country. It is only within comparatively recent years that sanitary reforms have been applied to Egypt, and these mainly in the large towns and health resorts. The results of these returns have been sufficiently encouraging to warrant their extensions in a modified manner to the villages.

The construction of the villages and their surroundings are generally such that a standard of sanitary excellence in accordance with Western notions can only be very slowly achieved. The houses are overcrowded congeries of mud walls, badly built and badly ventilated. There is generally an entire lack of conservancy arrangements, and man and domestic animals live in close relations. The water supply is mainly from canals which are open to all sorts of contamination, and as the subsoil water is near the surface, pools abound almost everywhere and a condition of thing exists which we find suitable to the development of ankylostomiasis and bilharziasis. Further, to build a village mud bricks have to be made, and the consequent removal of soil causes depressions round each village. These are subsequently filled with stagnant subsoil water polluted with organic matter of all sorts, thus creating a fruitful source of disease. These so-called "biraks" are gradually being filled up, with evident advantage to the health of the inhabitants. The land thus reclaimed is useful for relieving the congestion in the village and to provide open spaces for the inhabitants.

Within the last few years much has been done to improve the sanitary conditions of the country; and it is gratifying to note that the people themselves "have to some extent overcome their dislike of sanitary measures":—

The notification of infectious diseases is now general, and concealment is the exception and not the rule, as formerly. The people no longer object to be isolated for infectious diseases. They come willingly for medical help, and increased facilities are being afforded them to obtain first aid, especially in cases of infantile diseases. It is a very striking fact that a few years ago it was a matter of the greatest difficulty to account for and medically examine pilgrims who return to their homes from the Hedjaz. This now proceeds quite smoothly, and instead of being run to earth with difficulty in their villages, they come of their own accord to be examined.

In this connection a remark elsewhere (P. 11) of the Report is of interest:—

Hospital accommodation in Egypt has been slightly increased, and a satisfactory feature is that a larger number of patients now come voluntarily into the hospitals. The prejudice which has existed for so many years in Egypt against hospitals of all kinds is gradually disappearing. This is chiefly due to the fact that the Egyptian medical officer who staff these hospitals are better educated and more efficient in their work than in years gone by. The standard of nursing has also been raised, and more attention is given to the training of the attendants.

As one of the means for improving the sanitary condition of the villages the Report suggests.

The organisation of a system of village sanitary inspection, consisting of about one inspector for ten villages, who would report to the Markaz doctor all that happened in regard to health questions and sanitary matters in the villages under his charge. A soldier who had served his time and become a non-commissioned officer in the Egyptian Army, with a little training in this kind of work, would probably make a very suitable sanitary inspector. The improvement in the villages themselves would then proceed on lines of proper conservancy (which would do much to prevent ankylostoma and bilharzia infections), the filling up of "biraks," the erection of decent, ventilated houses, and the arrangement of a purer water supply.

The measures already taken to combat ankylostomiasis and bilharziasis by means of a travelling ankylostoma hospital have met with marked success. An active campaign is also being carried on against ophthalmia and trachoma; and the establishment of maternity schools and children's dispensaries in the provincial towns are amongst the steps already taken to check the high rate of infantile mortality.

THE FIVE-FEDDAN LAW.

Regarding the Five-Feddan law, the Report remarks that "the prediction that the diminution of credit caused by the law would force sales of land and lead to evasion of the law has not been borne out by events. Sales of the land of the category affected by the law show, on the contrary, a decrease, while the number of cases of contracting out of the law have been so few as to be entirely negligible." A table shows that the number of properties of 5 feddans and less under debt is 619,107; their total area, 619,214 feddans; the total indebtedness of their owners, £E15,990,360—which gives an average of £25.828 per debtor. And the Report observes:—

It will be seen from the above table that the appalling weight of approximately £E16,000,000 of debt has to be borne by the poorest class of cultivators of the soil in this country, and is distributed amongst only 5 per cent. of the population. The fact that an average of over £E25 per feddan of debt exists on a very large number of properties, constitutes, when the high rate of interest is considered, a dangerous financial situation for a considerable number of their owners.

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION.

The bulk of the section of the Report dealing with the financial situation of the country consists of extracts from the Financial Adviser's Note on the Budget (which was fully dealt with in The Near East of April 3). Lord Kitchener expresses his concurrence with that Note generally, and his opinion that the changes introduced this year "represent a very important improvement in the administration of the finances of the country," and that "great credit attaches to the officials who are responsible for their inception and elaboration." Regarding the Egyptian debt we read:—

On December 31, 1912, the total outstanding capital of the Debt was £91,349,680, and the charge on account of interest and sinking fund £E3,552,000. Debt to the amount of £147,140 was paid off during the year. The total capital therefore amounted to £91,202,540 on December 31, 1913, and the annual charge for interest and sinking fund to £E3,552,000.

It has, however, to be borne in mind that stock to the extent of £5,459,920 is held either by the Government or by the Commissioners of the Debt. The interest on this amount is £E200,000.

The total amount of Debt in the hands of the public was therefore, at the end of last year, £88,472,620, involving an annual charge of £E3,352,000

RAILWAYS.

The railways estimates provide for the completion of the Zifta-Zagazig line and the continuation of the Zayat-Menuf line. The new bridge over the Ibrahimia Canal at Assiut will be completed, and that over the Nile at Embaba will be continued. Work will be begun on the new station at Alexandria and on the new Pont-Limon station in Cairo. Provision is also made for relaying of track, improvements to stations and signalling, construction of staff quarters, additional rolling stock, and improvements of the Upper Egypt auxiliary lines.

1913 has not been such a good year for the railways as 1912. There has been a decrease in traffic and a corresponding reduction in receipts, which are £E3,819,000, as compared with £E3,916,000 in 1912. The decrease is mainly in cotton and cotton seed, but also to a small extent in building material, sugar, and onions. The number of passengers travelling has decreased some-what, mainly owing to the new Cantonal Courts, which have enabled people to get their minor cases settled without travelling to the towns.

The auxiliary railways of Upper Egypt show a slight increase in earnings compared with 1912. Passengers have increased. This is mainly due to the opening of the Beni Suef-Lahun line. The Luxor-Aswan line has done well. There is a slight decrease in receipts, as in the other branches, but the reduction in expenditure more than counterbalances the loss in receipts.

The total length of the light railways of Egypt (viz., the Egyptian Delta Light Railways, the Chemins de Fer de la Basse-Egypte, and the Fayum Light Railway) now open amounts to 1,280 kilom., an increase of 32 kilom. as compared with 1912. The increase is due to a new line from Sahib to Ballim, which has been constructed by the Delta Light Railway Company.

A table (page 28) gives the total areas under the chief crops in 1913 as being:—Cotton, 1,723,091 feddans; wheat, 1,305,578 feddans; barley, 369,158 feddans; rice, 212,367 feddans; maize, 1,632,556 feddans; millet, 220,204 feddans; and sugar, 48,168 feddans.

There is a growing demand for Government cotton-seed, 90,096 ardebs having been distributed to cultivators in 1912, as compared with 12,273 ardebs the previous year.

Cotton-seed breeding at Giza and Qorashia has resulted in the production of four new strains of cotton. These have been submitted to a committee of experts in Alexandria, who recommended one variety for propagation on an increased scale. By subsequent experiments it is hoped to obtain an earlier maturing cotton which can be harvested before the boll-worm has time to hatch.

By means of thirty-eight demonstration farms, during the past year endeavours have been made to show the small farmer how to improve the cultivation of the soil by employing the means and labour at his disposal in a more intelligent and economical manner than formerly.

The unduly large discharge outlets from the canals have been replaced by pipes of varying dimensions, according to the size of the area to be served. It is hoped that this change will tend to check the over-watering of the soil, an irresistible temptation to a peasantry who have for centuries had to contend with summer drought, and thus minimise the risk of over-saturation, which is as bad for the cotton crop as insufficient moisture. Experiments in the application of water on the soil have been continued, but with varying results in different localities, due, perhaps, to low flood.

The measures taken against the cotton worm, the common boll-worm, and the pink boll-worm are described in detail.

As to cotton markets (halaqas) we reap:—

Experience in 1912 has shown that certain of these halaqas were badly situated. These have been suppressed and others opened to replace them in more suitable localities. There has been a remarkable discrepancy in the results obtained by the halaqas in different districts. In certain places they have met with great success and evidently respond to a long-felt need; in others they have failed to meet with much support. On the whole there has been an increase of approximately 50,000 kantar entering the halaqas in 1913, as compared with the previous season.

An arrangement for the sale in the halaqas (by the Provincial Councils on behalf of the Khedivial Agricultural Society) of manure "has been an unqualified success, and is being extended."

Russia and England.

(By H. G. WELLS.)

[MR. WELLS has a faculty for observation among the best possessed by a modern writer. He has just been to Russia for the first time. He sees there a striking similarity in outward appearance between the English and the Russian, a similarity that America usually does not think of as existing between these races. But when it comes to essentials of character and thought he believes the Russians are very different from the English, simpler and more direct. And they care more for spiritual things.]

"And about our difference, that naturally is a large part of my aimful, for the first interest of the foreign visitor to any country is the making of comparisons. Are the English and Russian remarkably alike or remarkably dissimilar? So far as the look of things goes, it is the likeness surprises me. Russians certainly look more like Englishmen than any other people I have ever been among. They not only look like Englishmen but they move like Englishmen, they hold their hands, and arms and sit in chairs like Englishmen and their disposition in customs is English. And the Russian women are English too, with a kind of natural freshness and an inattention to smartness that contrasts vividly with the French or American women. They are far more English than the Americans in style and carriage and intonation. You can tell whether people talking in the next room are English or American, but not whether they are English or Russian. Coming to Russia as I did by way of Berlin this similarity of Russian and English was the more striking. In Berlin one could distinguish English people thirty yards off. In Russia they are indistinguishable. The audiences at the performances of the 'Three Sisters' and 'Hamlet' that I watched at the Moscow Art Theatre might have been the younger and brighter half of the London Fabian Society the people that poured out into the corridors, from the Ballet might have poured out of the Albert Hall. The crowd in the streets, more particularly in the evenings after the shop are lit, is exactly like an English crowd except that most of the men wear fur hats and caps instead of bowlers and that there are no soft felt hats at all. Only once or twice have I been struck by an un-English physiognomy in the population. One of these occasions was when I visited the St. Petersburg People's Place. At that popular assembly there were many Finns and also a number of Great Russian soldiers who had a peculiar broad facial type that is rarely seen in England.

"They reminded me of Gorky and like him they were tall men and they moved slowly and thoughtfully. But the mass of the gathering in its physique and manners was exactly like what one would see at a festival in the People's Place at Whitechapel except that there were far fewer Semitic faces. And the distinctive beards and caps of the cabmen in St. Petersburg and Moscow bring out the fact that many of them have pointed noses with incurved bridges, a sort of nose that is uncommon in Britain. But is it just the universal likeness that throws up peculiar individuals and peculiar little features of this sort. I find I sit easily with Russian even when we cannot exchange a word of comprehensible speech, I feel I know what their motives and what their movements are going to be and why they look at me and what they are going to think. Our English sources of information about Russia come from peculiar people who suffer from peculiar grievances. They had left me quite unprepared for this intimate resemblances.

"Subsequent experience have not removed this first impression of an astonishing resemblance and sympathy; they have only added to it something else. And that something else is realization of a profound difference. I perceive now more clearly than I did at first that not only are the Russian and the English as alive as two gloves but that they are as different as left and right. They are as different as east and west, as positive and negative, as midday and midnight, albeit the figures are the same. Or perhaps, to take a better image, they are as different as a wood engraving and a color print of exactly the same thing.

"I do not discover any explanation for this difference. I cannot even say whether it is something in the training and tradition or something in the race. It comes to me in a variety of aspect and all I can do is to tell just one or two of the chief of these. And quiet the chief is that the Russian is profoundly religious. Italy abounds in noble churches because the Italian are artists and architects; a church is an essential part of the old English social system; but Moscow glitters with two thousand crosses because the people are organically Christian. I feel in Russia that for the first time in my life I am in a country where Christianity is alive. The people I saw crossing themselves whenever they passed a church, the bearded men who kissed the relics in the church of the Assumption, the unkempt grave-eyed pilgrim with ragged bundle on his back and his little tin tea-kettle slung in front of him, who was standing quite still beside a pillar in the same church, have no parallel in England. In comparison England is altogether irreligious. The English churches in our city street and strand, as it were, apart and forgotten; Saint Paul's cathedral floats over London like a neglected ornament in a busy house; if you go in you will find the most beautiful music, the most appreciative of audiences—for it is an audience, not a congregation—and no sense of worship. Visibly as invisibly and all it symbolizes is made up of shadowy grays and delicate visibly as invisibly Saint Paul's cathedral in London lines and soft indistinctnesses, in supreme contrast with the wrought brass, the burnished gold, the chanting and the smell of incense of Russia.

"Now it is remarkable that when I turn from the Russian altars to what I suppose is the pole of Russian life, to the intelliganza and to the life of the skeptical classes as I find it represented in plays and novels and the stories that are told to me, I still find exactly the same contrast with England. It is not therefore a mere difference of creed that we are dealing with. I still find the Russians earnest and simple and warm and religious. He still believes in a real presence. In the crisis of life the emancipated Russian stops to talk philosophy and weigh moral values as his orthodox brother prays or goes upon a pilgrimage. These things are more real to them than action. For both of them there is a tribunal where verdicts matter more than the bare facts, the practicalities of life, the superficialities of life. They may give that tribunal different names or no name at all, but it is there, inside them. 'But what is the good of talking now?' asks the Englishman in an extremity, confessing himself entirely engaged by practicality. In an extremity the Russian always talks.

"From plays and books I could, if I had the industry, extract a hundred instances to point this comparison. It is manifest even in suicide. The Englishman kills himself on practical grounds, because the game is up, because he is disgraced, because there is nothing else to be done. He kills himself, I admit rarely. Russians will tolerate misfortunes and ignominies and their own misbehaviour to an extent that Englishmen would declare intolerable and on the other hand kill themselves on a high theoretical score, because life is imperfect or will inadequate or love has gone astray. It is not that they are less realist than the English but because their sense of reality goes deeper. That I think, I must generalize, is the key to very many of the contrasts between us. The English seem to have no real beliefs, their church is a phantom, their monarchy a constitutional influence, their lives ruled by appearances and uncontrolled by conscience and heart-searchings. No man talks of his religion or discusses his aims in life it may be that Englishmen have no religion and no aims in life. In default there is respectability. In Russia things are taken seriously. The Russian's soul, just as his churches and his pictures and his children's toys, is done in stronger, simpler, more emphatic colors. His religion is real, his monarchy is real, his life is a business of passionate self-examination, because he has faith. Russia is full of faith, overflowing with faith, the ointment runs down upon the beard; and I who am an Englishman and have thought much of England all my life, do not know whether England has any faith at all or if only it is very subtly and deeply hidden."—Harper's Weekly.

In one of his earlier volumes Kipling has a vivid description of an Indian newspaper office on a hot weather night—a description calculated to give pause to the most enthusiastic aspirant to journalistic honours, says a writer in St. Andrew, the Scottish Church Magazine. Some of Kipling's pictures are doubtless drawn from his powerful imagination, but when he wrote about newspaper work in Lahore he was simply recalling his own personal experiences. For Kipling began life in a newspaper office, and I sometimes think it is a pity he ever sought a wider sphere of labour. It has sometimes seemed to me that Kipling is not a man of letters—he is only a glorified journalist. And, as everybody knows, there is a big difference between the literary man and the journalist. But I am disagreeing.

My first editor in India, by the way, was also the bear-leader of Rudyard Kipling. 'Yes,' he used to say, 'I was helping to run the—Gazette when Buddy Kipling came, an ugly duckling—a very ugly duckling he was, too—to Lahore.' And in proof of this, he showed me a little paper-covered book which afterwards, I suppose, became very valuable—a first edition of 'Departmental Ditties,' I think it was, on the flyleaf of which were written two verses, in Kipling's autograph, inscribed 'To A. M.' and beginning as follows:—

Between the paste pot and the hears,

The awful emblems of my trade—

First fruits of two hot Indian years—

These rhymes were made.

The second verse hails Macdonald (formerly editor of the Englishman) as 'pastmaster of my craft'—and Kipling never spoke a truer word. Andrew Macdonald was not only one of the most distinguished journalists who have ever laboured in India, but also the most brilliant and cultured conversationalist I have ever listened to.

UNDER THE PUNKHA.

Well, journalism in India is, like other occupations carried on in his country, a warm business. The electric fan has modified that condition a good deal, especially at night; but there were few tasks more trying than writing paragraphs or reading proofs in the small hours of the morning when the punkawalla had gone to sleep, and you couldn't spare the time to go and wake him, because the printers were howling for copy, and the paper was going to bed in an hour or two.

The journalist who comes to India from an English paper must be prepared to find a moral atmosphere less robust than prevails at Home in England, if anybody ventured to go up to a reporter, and offer him money in order to hush up a case, that case would be reported with special headlines as a protest against the insult. But in India the reporters are just the other way. One speedily finds out that a great many cases are reported, or left out because someone has bribed, or has omitted to bribe the reporter. I have even heard of editors being 'got at,' but in such cases I feel sure that they must have been editors who had never served any apprenticeship to English journalism. Whatever charge may be levelled against the English newspaper man—of sensationalism, of partizanship, or of Daily Telegraphese—he is absolutely incorruptible.

THE REPORTER'S ARTFUL AID.

Then, again, some reporters have a festive way of introducing their own comments into the report of a case before the High Court. The very first night I ever took late duty in India I came across a proof of the report of a case in which the reporter had calmly inserted a gloss of his own in reporting a speech from the Bench! If that interpolation had gone in the paper would certainly have been committed for contempt of court, I struck it out.

Strange as it may seem, the English journalist in India may be said to wield a greater influence than his 'confrere' at Home. I mean he may exercise a more direct influence upon events. After all, the average statesman, or politician at Home is not often influenced by what he sees in the press—when he does see it. He is so accustomed to being blackguarded and found fault with by the journals which cater for the other side that he becomes case-hardened. The statesman, or official in this country, is in quite a different position. He seems to develop a curious sensitiveness on the subject of press criticism, and I have heard of high officials being so upset by things that have been said about them in the papers, that they have been known to drop their monocles out of their optics through sheer nervousness.

BRINGING PRESSURE TO BEAR.

The most remarkable instance in my experience of what can be done by a newspaper in the way of bringing pressure to bear even upon a high and mighty Government like that of India happened a long time ago when plague was a new experience for India—so new, in fact that it had not reached Calcutta at all. It was understood to be 'raging' in Bombay but it had not attempted to cross India and naturally the Calcutta people were not in the least anxious that it should. One fine day however the proprietor of the paper which then monopolised my energies received private information that the Government of India proposed to rail Haj pilgrims from the Bombay side down to Diamond Harbour, where a camp was to be established for them, and whence the pilgrim ships were to convey them to the Hedjaz. We knew there would be a row over this, if it became known because if any cases were reported in the camp at Diamond Harbour Calcutta would inflict a blow upon her trade. My proprietor accordingly made a determined attempt to interview the Viceroy who was then in Calcutta but was refused an audience as his Excellency was just about to start for Barrackpur. The Burra Sahib offered to go to Barrackpur to see him but this offer was civilly declined.

Then he got angry. 'Look here' he said to me, when his second attempt failed, 'we have now got to show this thing up. Just write me a strong article pointing out the madness of this scheme and see whether that will not have some effect.'

I wrote an article about it, accordingly pitching it fairly strongly and the result far exceeded my modest expectations. This article appeared on Monday morning. In an hour telegrams were speeding to the tea districts in Assam, the jute districts in Bengal, the coal districts—everywhere. At noon a special meeting of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce was held to protest against the idea; and this protest, together with similar resolutions passed at a number of centres in Assam and Bengal was forwarded to the Government before nightfall. Simultaneously the Home cables were set in motion. The protests were telegraphed to London and appeared in the evening papers. A question was put in the House of Commons that night; and the very next morning the Home Government cabled out orders to stop the business. A crowded 24 hours was it not? Experiences like this make one feel for the time being that one is not quite the fly upon the wheel that one is apt to imagine oneself generally. It makes up for a lot—for the climate, the low ideals which surround one, the difficulties of bringing out a paper at all, the feeling that one is remote from the full tide of political and social life which flows so strongly through the great arteries of Europe.

THE MOHAMMADAN TRACT AND BOOK DEPOT, PUNJAB. (Kutub Khana-i-Islami, Punjab,) Lahore.

This Depot was opened after long and careful consideration. Its main object is the publication of books the study of which would not only be a source of pleasure, but also afford moral and spiritual instruction, teaching men to hate vice and love virtue; to bear a good moral character; to shun evil company; to regard the Supreme Being with due awe and reverence; to kindle a desire for piety, to fulfil the duties laid upon man by God; to promote mutual sympathy and good will; to put away prejudice, malice, annoyance, irreligiosity, bigotry, disobedience, &c.; and especially to become perfectly acquainted with the Tenets of Islam, in order to be able to successfully cope with its opponents; and lastly to have a true and complete knowledge of our illustrious predecessors and their glorious deeds.

Though hundreds of valuable books and tracts treating of the above subjects have already been published from time to time the majority of them have the disadvantage of being bulky volumes dealing with abstruse doctrines in Persian or Arabic and are sold at very high prices. The general public can neither afford to buy them nor do they possess ability sufficient to master them or have time to search out important facts therefrom. In plain words, there are few books to be found in simple Urdu or simple English suitable to the tastes of the rising generation and the public at large. The promoters have, therefore, resolved to undertake the task of propagating such books as are capable of meeting the aforesaid wants; several of these having been translated into English for the benefit to those who possess a special taste for the language; and this plan will in future, always be observed. The books that are in both English and Urdu will, it is hoped, be of considerable help to students and those who desire to improve their English. Another advantage expected from the works in English is that such non-Muslims and others as are desirous of learning the principles of Islam and can read no language except English will study them, which while satisfying them will serve the purpose of spreading a knowledge of the tenets of Islam.

1. *APOLOGY FOR MOHAMMAD AND THE QURAN By John Davenport, the book is divided into four parts. (1) Biography of Mohammad; (2) the Quran and its Marvellousness; (3) The Charges against Mohammad refuted; (4) Beauties of the Quran. The author acknowledged the Holy Prophet to be the real Restorer of the Worship of the One True God; a great religious reformer and legislator, and one of the rarest and most transcendent geniuses the world has ever produced. From its contents it is apparent that the book is worthy of perusal by all lovers of truth ... 0 12 0

2. *LECTURES ON ISLAM, delivered at different places in India, by Mohd. Alexander Russell Webb, late American Consul. The able lecturer is an inhabitant of America, and convinced of the insufficiency of the Christian faith entirely renounced it, devoted years to the study of almost all other religious systems of the world, none of which satisfied him. Further search after truth led him to Islam, which he embraced after thorough study. This pamphlet would serve as a guide to all who seek truth ... 0 4 0

3. ISLAMIC PRAYERS, (Namaz) Islamic Prayers or Divine Services in English, with necessary instructions, Duas, Private Prayers, Sermons, a Table of Periods, and Names of Prayers, with a tract on prayer, &c.

4. MERITS OF ISLAM, OR THE PRIMITIVE FAITH. By U. B. H. Snow, M.A., a Catechism of Religious Belief with a compendium of notes based on reason and divine authority, founded on history, logic, science, philosophy and common sense, and recommended to the notice of conscientious, liberal-minded and sensible people of all classes and creeds ... 0 3 0

7. FAITH OF ISLAM. An explanatory sketch of the principal Fundamental Tenets of the Muslim Religion, by W. H. Quilliam, President of the Muslim Institute, Liverpool. 0 4 0

8. FANATICS AND FANATICISM. A lecture delivered by W. H. Quilliam on his renouncing Christianity and embracing Islam. He found that he was looked upon as a species of monomaniac and when he endeavoured to induce people to discuss the respective merits of the two religions he was either laughed at or insulted and was styled as a fanatic. In this lecture the author has stated that there has been a number of different bands of men to whom from time to time the same opprobrious appellation has been applied, and cites instances of George Stephenson, Mr. Rowland, &c., &c., the pioneers of present day civilisation. The book should be in the hands of all who have a scientific turn of mind and wish religious truth to be practically proved to them. 0 4 0

9. POLYGAMY. A lecture delivered by Dr. Mohammad Abdul Gani, B.A. The lecturer has proved by good reasons that a man might have more wives than one if his object of the gratification of his desire, the purity of his mind, and obtaining good offspring—are not accomplished by marrying one wife provided his condition and bodily strength enable him to observe justice towards them all. He may have two wives or three or four, but he can never be a husband of more wives than four at the same time ... 0 2 0

10. OUR YOUNG GENERATION. By Dr. Mohammad, Abdul Gani, B.A. This lecture deals with the present time in a most suitable manner and supplies one of the wants of the age dealing as it does with our rising generation, on which depends the future of Islam to a great extent ... 0 2 0

11. EARLY MUSLIMS AND THEIR GOLDEN DEEDS. A lecture in which the lecturer dwells upon the God-fearing and truth-loving Caliphs, and what other celebrated brave, hardy and pious early Muslims after them did in the cause of faith and brotherhood, cultivating knowledge, sciences and arts. The lecture further compares the present deplorable condition of Muhammadans to what it was. A very instructive booklet, 0 2 0

12. ESSAY on the question whether Islam has been beneficial or injurious to human society in general and, in relation to the Moslem and Christian dispensations. The subject has been treated in an impartial spirit, free from illiberality, prejudice and acrimony. The subject matter is divided into four lectures—1 On the Advantages derived by Human Society in general from Islam, 2—Refutation of the accusation that Islam has been injurious to Human Society. 3—Benefits and Advantages which Judaism and Christianity derived from Islam. 4—Advantages derived from Islam by Christianity in particular, 0 3 0

13. WOMEN IN ISLAM. By Sayad Amir Ali, M.A., C.I.E., Judge of the High Court of Judicature in Bengal, India, with the addition of the three articles from the Musalliman of India. From what has been said by the European world on the subject one is apt to draw a one-sided and therefore wrong conclusion, and corrective becomes necessary, which our pamphlet supplies. In view of the importance of the subject we recommend the book to all impartial readers, coming as it does from such a high authority as Sir Syad Amir Ali ... 0 4 0

17. MOHAMMADANISM. By G. W. Leitner, L.L.D. It is a lecture delivered by the author at South Place Chapel, London. The author is well known Oriental Scholar but what lends interest to the present work is that his views of Islam differ from those of Sir William Muir whom he accuses for misrepresenting Mohammadanism. Coming from such a learned man, the book assumes a particular interest for Muslims ... 0 4 0

18. PRAYER BOOK FOR MUSLIMS. By U. Hamid Snow, Author of the "Merits of Islam." 20. TEACHINGS OF ISLAM. Many books, no doubt, have been written on Islam and different have been the views expressed by different writers but very few have represented it in its true light, and this is what the present pamphlet aims at doing. It serves as a truthful guide to a religion which counts upon millions as its adherents, and to the believers, dazzled by the western light if so it can be called, the worth of the religion they hold to how to practice it and how successfully to live it out. The actual experience of such souls as Miss Lacy who never rest satisfied unless they see things for themselves contribute much to clear away the mist of ignorance that hung before Europe's eyes for a long time and led to the condemnation of Islam off-handedly as a most "inhuman" religion. 35. THE MUSLIM WARS. A Critical Exposition of the popular Jihad, by Mowlvi Charagh Ali. The author has most ingeniously tried to prove by historical facts that most of the Islamic wars were defensive, and waged on the same principle as now recognised by Europe itself "to save and keep one's own." As the question (of Jihad) disturbed the mind of the whole of Europe at one time and even still does, in some places, it would be well for the English educated to what our Prophet's Jihad was. They would do well to buy this handy, at the same time, authoritative, pamphlet ... 0 6 0

At the end of this book is given an interesting lecture on Muslims in Spain by Mr. Amir Ali ... 0 4 0

33. PRACTICAL PHILOSOPHY OF MOHAMMADAN PEOPLE, English translation of Akhlaq-i-Jalali, from the Persian of Faqir Jan Mohammad Ashad, by W. F. Thompson. A single sentence of this book signifies as to its contents—"Strive ye, for every one may attain to that for which he has been constituted." It is the failure to attain this worthy goal that contributes, though indirectly, to so much human misery that we see around us. If all human powers were trained and allowed to develop in the direction naturally intended for them we may see less of this misery, and, to say the least, it is this—the training of the human faculties in the right direction—that this book has in view. We may recommend it to all who wish to lead an honourable and useful life. A very uncommon book ... 1 8 0

39. MANNERS AND MORALS OF THE PROPHET. By Imam Ghizali. The very name of the Imam, so well and deservedly known and praised by Europeans, leaves nothing to be said on the subject, but we may say this much that we have had the book translated especially for our English educated gentlemen, who read of the Prophet of Arabia from prejudiced sources, and hence draw frivolous conclusions ... 0 2 0

44. THE PURITY OF THE TEXT OF THE HOLY QURAN. By Mowlvi Mohammad Ali, M. A. It is next to impossible to do justice to the contents of the book in a few lines. The masterly way in which the author calls into question the authority of such noted writers as Imam Sayuti, &c., and compares traditions is a proof sufficient of his ability. As the subject is one which has exercised the brains of men of genius we recommend this book to every aesthetically minded Muslim seeking the beauty and truth of this Grand Book ... 0 9 0

45. 202 AEsOP'S FABLES WITH 202 MORALS. No doubt the notoriety AEsop's fables have attained makes it unnecessary for us to dilate upon their usefulness, but each fable taken by itself leaves much in its true application, and it is with this view that this book has been got up. It might be useful to young and old with equal benefit, preparing the former for the life's struggle and testifying to the latter's experience in life, 0 6 0

46. UNITY VERSUS TRINITY. The question taken up in this book is a burning one as all would admit, and as such required a most delicate treatment. To avoid running to extreme, like Barnes, and other writers on the life of Christ and Bible, a close study of the subject was necessary, which we have not spared. As a result we invite the religious-minded—and where is the man who is not so—to take up this book and find out for himself which side the balance sways ... 0 9 0

47. MR. SELL ON ISLAM. Mr. Sell is but a recent representative of the school of Sprenger and Prideaux, who tried to "jump" upon Europe with their Islamic "enormities," using this as a cover to hide their crass ignorance while posing as authorities

Those who are acquainted with the views expressed by European writers on the subjects at different times in different languages would at once admit the value of this book and hasten to read how these "biased opinions" have been disposed of in a most reasonable manner. Endeavours of Europeans—as an outcome of their ignorance of Islamic literature—have all along directed towards finding fault with whatever is Islamic and does not coincide with their own views. Moreover, as all the subjects treated of in this book have an important bearing on the development of Muslim Society, no Muslim should be without it ... 1 0 0

49. ISLAM AS A MORAL AND POLITICAL IDEAL. By Dr. Mohammad Iqbal, M.A., B.A., Barrister-at-Law, Lahore. It is a calling necessity that the young generation should take an interest in matters Islamic, and this lecture we deem as the direction which others able to tackle with the subject should take. This book too commands great respect both among the Arabs and the Europeans, conveying as it does practical lessons of daily life which can hardly be learned through the whole course of a life. The beauty of this book consists most in preaching living truth in a most interesting and taking style to the readers. We have put this book within reach of the general public, and those will benefit great who would go the length of spending ten annas to possess themselves of it; it is a treasure of ages ... 0 10 0

To trace the development of the scientific and literary spirit from such a dusky period as the dawn on Arabic history is truly a work of patient study and toil and the success achieved by the author renders him in every way worthy of perusal by all interested in the progress of humanity in general and Muslims in particular. 53. SINLESSNESS OF PROPHETS. The motif of this brilliant composition is to bring before the eyes of the reader, in a philosophical dress, those towering personalities which mark the turning points of the religious conscience of humanity, and, as divine agents to "gather the strayed sheep unto the Lord's fold," proves the sinlessness of prophets in a most convincing manner. Though treating of a somewhat difficult subject, yet the book is written in a light style and deserves to be accorded the highest rank in the Islamic Literature ... 1 0 0

54. THE PEARLS OF THE ISLAMIC FAITH. Islam, no doubt, is already known to some by its historical development, but its tenets have exercised the greatest brains—both for and against it—and in the publication of this pamphlet we simply meet the public half way in supplying a long felt want. The spirit of the time has obliged almost every religion to dress up "rotten bones" with new flesh, but the beauty of Islam lies in this that each one of its tenet carries conviction in a most simple manner:—Question— How? Answer— Read this book and you will find it ... 1 4

55. THE DIVINE ORIGIN OF THE HOLY QURAN. A Reply to the "Source of Islam." As logically proved in the book, Revd. Clair Tisdal Torgot, while writing his Yasabi in Islam in Persia, the time came that "those who live in the houses should not cast stones at others." How easily the divine origin of the Quran has been proved while saying Muir and Tisdal thread-bare will be torn by every one who reads this book. To say the least, we specially recommend this book to the attention of all reasonable men for the truth for its own sake. 0 10 0

56. THE SWORD AS WIELDED BY ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY. A COMPARISON—Comparison are truly odious but when the Christians for want of any other plea won't desist from advancing the long exploded accusation about Islam having been spread by the sword it becomes necessary to compare the two religions (Islam and Christianity) and show once for all as to which of them makes the best stand for the rights of humanity and this is done in a most satisfactory manner in the book. This manual is meant for those who love a comparative study of religions. 0 3 0

57. THE PRINCIPLES OF ISLAM. By M. Mohammed Ali, M.A. How people generally grope in the dark for want of knowledge of the principles of a particular religion and how this lack again gives rise to notions quite contrary to what the religion is founded upon, is obvious in all literatures and it is to counteract this that this pamphlet is published. For English readers it is an actuality. 0 2 0

58. HAS ANY BOOK BEEN REVEALED IF SO WHICH?—In this age of Agnosticism the question—Can there be revelation at all—required to be answered, and not shirked over, but that Islam of all religions should choose to answer it, at once makes for it authenticity. The author has endeavoured to solve the problem from a religious point of view, and it is this which makes the book worth reading. 0 3 0

59. DR. KURL KUMME'S ATTACK ON THE HOLY QURAN. By Mr. Mohammed Timur. It was time that Dr. Kumm's vaunted Orientalism should have been put to test. With a very few exceptions European writers have always been inimically disposed towards each other, and the question

why? May be answered by ignorance of the former so far as this religion is concerned. A close study of the tenets of religion original and a mere second hand knowledge of them are two different things, and it is the latter disease that Dr. Kumm seems to be suffering from, but he finds a good expositor in M. Mohammed Timur, and with this object in view we recommend the book to our readers. 0 3 0

60. THE DOCTRINE OF ATONEMENT.—By M. Abdul Haq. For exposing the absurdity of this doctrine from the stand-point of Christianity itself the authority deserves particular credit, and those who have studied Christianity as a revealed religion will do well to read this pamphlet. It will lead them to truth. C 8 0

61. ISLAM AND HINDUISM COMPARED. With certain notes on certain Christian tenets. This book has not its equal on the subject and is very instructive and important. The study of this invaluable book is absolutely necessary. To a non-Muslim it will serve as a guide to know a false from a true religion and by curing his prejudice render him "citizen of the world," pages 372. 1 8 0

62. THE SPREAD OF ISLAM. An elaborate account of the advent and development of the Faith and the wonderful sacrifice and perseverance of the Holy prophet and his companions in propagating it. The book is very interesting and impressive, a cursory glance over it makes one believe that this religion is really from God and that the votaries sacrificed and perished gladly and wonderfully in its propagation. 0 12 0

63. The Ideal of Womanhood in Islam. 0 8 0

64. THE RELIABILITY OF THE TRADITION OF THE PROPHET. Very argumentative and important. 0 3

65. JEWELS OF ISLAM. Even the enemies of Islam have admitted this much that the founder of this Faith was a great regenerator of humanity and as such must be known. In this pamphlet attempt is made to instil into the minds of our student how to become religious as well as remain men of the world. 0 4 0

NEWS AND NOTES.

A great event of the history of 1857 is that an Englishman refused to save his life by repeating a phrase from the Holy Koran.

Four hundred years or so have gone since Bible stories were possible on the London stage. In recent years the censor or censors have persecuted the devil and all his ways to be treated freely by the dramatist, but any dealings with Bible themes have been sternly forbidden.

It is a fact, that a railway accident strongly touches the public imagination.

No plea of expense must be allowed to interfere with the installation of the method of signalling best calculated to give safety to the hundreds of millions who use the railways every year.

It is peculiar, that when the sinners are doomed they cry, "For God's sake help us out," but no one can rescue them from the wrath of God and man.

It would appear desirable, that at least for the future, the term "bank" "bankers", etc., should not be allowed to be used except by registered companies.

LIFE AFTER DEATH.

In his presidential address to the British Association, at Birmingham, Sir Oliver Lodge gave a very useful piece of advice to scientists. He urged the continuity of the life of matter, and appealed to scientists not to take a negative view of things outside their own special studies, but to endeavour to co-ordinate all sciences and establish some guiding and unifying principle for all to study the unknown as well as the known and to overcome their scepticism.

He concluded by declaring that he did not shrink from a personal note. Summarising the results on his own mind of thirty years' experience of psychical research by himself and his co-workers he was convinced that occurrences now regarded as occult could be examined and judged to order by the methods of science, and the facts so examined convinced him that memory and affection were not limited to that association with matter whereby alone they might manifest themselves here and now, and that personality persisted beyond bodily death.

of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that mask is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only 13s. 4d.. Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

The Week.

Ulster.

London, June 17.

Sir Edward Carson stated in an interview that the only communication he had received from Mr. Asquith was a letter from the Premier before Whitsuntide, asking him to supply a map showing the positions of different parties in Ulster.

London, June 30.

Mr. Lloyd-George speaking at Denmark Hall said the Amending Bill would give every county in Ulster the option of voting itself out of the Home Rule until two general elections had occurred in England. Ulsterites had no need to shoot anybody. All they had to do was to go to the polling booth and record their opinion. A male suffragist interrupter was ejected during the meeting and thrown into a pond.

London, June 23.

The House of Lords was thronged to-day when Lord Crewe introduced the Amending Bill. His Lordship affirmed that the more they heard of the sentiments of Ulster, the more they were convinced of the profundity of religious difficulties. They made some form of exclusion imperative. He dwelt on the injustice of the total exclusion of Ulster. The Bill consequently embodied Mr. Asquith's proposal made in March for the exclusion by county. It provided for the necessary adjustments, financial and administrative, in this connection. He assured the Opposition that any amendments would receive careful consideration.

Lord Lansdowne expressed profound disappointment. He agreed that it was advisable to defer the debate. He pointed out that the Bill merely embodied Mr. Asquith's proposal which had been demolished and rejected now Lord Crewe had guilelessly submitted them as Government's utmost offer. Government knew the Bill could not prevent civil war. The House adopted the first reading.

London, June 23.

In the House of Commons, Sir Luke White (Liberal) announced that he would support Mr. Hayea-Fisher's amendment. Mr. George Roberts on behalf of the Labour members announced that his colleagues would abstain.

The Liberal dissentients to the Finance Bill have formed a group to shape the policy in the direction of economy.

London, June 23.

Though the Irish Unionist Members of the House of Commons declare that nothing will satisfy them short of clean out of the whole of Ulster from Home Rule, the general view is that a compromise is feasible and that there is no great difficulty except regarding the position of the disputed counties Fermanagh and Tyrone in comparison with which time limit is regarded as minor question.

Greece and Turkey.

Berlin, June 18.

Germany has agreed to the proposal of the Porte that the representatives of the Embassies at Constantinople shall investigate the position of the Greeks in Asia Minor.

Bukharest, June 18.

The King in opening Parliament said that Rumania was determined to maintain the balance of power in the Balkans and to work for peace in Europe.

Constantinople, June 19.

The Porte's reply to Greece, though conciliatory, alludes to perturbation, produced in Asia Minor by the influx of two hundred thousand Moslem refugees from Macedonia, obliged to flee owing to persecution. The reply mentions the measures, taken to re-establish order and hopes that Greece will reciprocate in Macedonia. Nevertheless it evades Greek demands for the reinstatement of emigrants and the return of their property.

London, June 19.

London, June 19.

Though there is still optimism in European capitals with regard to Greco-Turkish situation the lights of lighthouses on the coast of Asia Minor are not being shown and two classes of Turkish Reservists have been called out. A feeling of pessimism in Constantinople is growing. The Servian declaration supporting Greece has made a strong impression on the Porte.

London, June 20.

It is understood that the Porte may permit the return of Greek emigrants and pay an indemnity. This would mean a settlement of the difficulty with Greece.—Reuter.

Athens, June 20.

The Porte's reply is regarded in official circles as showing a desire for a friendly settlement.—Reuter.

Washington, June 23.

Greece is urging President Wilson not to oppose the sale of the battleship "Mississippi" and "Idaho." President Wilson is said to have favoured the sale if it meant the peace in the Mediterranean. Turkey has protested against the sale. The House of Representatives has voted in favour of the authorisation to sell the battleships to Greece.

Athens, July 23.

It is understood that Greece accepts Turkey's proposal for the reinstatement and compensation of refugees who have remained on the coast of Asia Minor, also the proposal for the exchange of property with regard to Turkish or Greek refugees who have left Turkish or Greek territory.

Albania.

London, June 18.

Dutch Major Droon arrived at Durazzo yesterday morning simultaneously with Malissori reinforcements over which he took command.

It was reported in Rome yesterday evening that the insurgents had surrounded and wiped out a thousand Mirdites and Malissori.

The situation at Durazzo is critical, the population being on the verge of a panic after the severe defeat of the Airdites and Malissori in the abortive surprise of the insurgents' position in the mountain when they were surrounded and mown down by quickfiring, losing 700 killed. They are poor defenders of Durazzo which was reattacked last night, the fighting lasting one and a half hours.

Durazzo, June 18.

All was quiet at Durazzo this afternoon: and reinforcements of Italian and Austrian blue-jackets were withdrawn. An Austrian ship, chartered by the Austrian Government, cruised off the coast this morning and bombarded rebel positions.

Durazzo, June 20.

Austrian and Italian warships have been instructed to fire if the Prince or Legations are endangered by a sudden insurgent attack.

The Insurgents declare that they are ready to recognise the Prince and ask for two day's armistice which has been granted.

Durazzo, June 22.

Government troops have been fighting the rebels at Karabunar and Luchina since Saturday. The Rebels drove them to-day to the River Semeni. Major Kroon has ordered a steamer to bring them to Durazzo.

Turkey and Persia.

Karachi, June 20.

The Sind Gazette learns from a reliable source that as a result of the Turco-Persian Frontier Commission Kasr-i-sh'rin and the oil-field of the Anglo-Persian Oil Coy., at Chia Surkab are now in Turkish territory. At Chia Surkab there is some difficulty in maintaining peace. The Turks who came to take possession of the place were repulsed by the Balian Kurds.

South Africa.

Cape Town, June 17.

The House of Assembly has passed the third reading of the Indian Relief Bill.

Cape Town, June 21.

The Senate is still discussing the second reading of the Indians Bill.

The Natal Mercury suggests that the Bill should be subject to the Indians having the alternative of returning to India or re-indenturing as by the repeal of the three pounds tax they are liable to become prohibited immigrants. It quotes the Indian paper, African Chronicle, as declaring that the state of the Indians will be worse than ever.—Reuter.

Cape Town, June 23.

The Senate has adopted the second reading of the Indian Relief Bill without division. The speakers expressed doubts as to whether it would effect a lasting solution of the Indian question. Some advocated that inducements should be given to Indians to return to their country.

Replying on behalf of the Government, General Smuts said that the contention that peace would not result should not prevent the Parliament from doing its plain duty in carrying out the recommendations of the commission. They could not contemplate the continuance of the policy of shooting down citizens and thereby setting distant parts of the Empire ablaze.

Writing to Senator Campbell, Mr. Gandhi denies any knowledge of the agitation against the Bill expressing that no responsible Indian has taken exception to it. He does not consider that the Bill makes Indians affected thereby prohibited immigrants. Mr. Campbell has also received an assurance from Mr. Smuts that the freedom of Indians whose indentures have expired will not be interfered with as suggested.

Cape Town, June 23.

The South African Union Assembly, debating the Riotous Assemblies and Criminal Law Amendment Bill, has reduced the penalties throughout. An amendment was moved by Sir Thomas Smartt making deportations applicable only in cases of persons actually convicted. The amendment was accepted by Government. A mass meeting outside the House burned a copy of the Bill.

The Baghdad Railway.

London, June 17.

The Anglo-German agreement regarding the Baghdad Railway deals with the navigation of the Tigris, the irrigation of the Mesopotamia, and the spheres of influence on the Baghdad railway and zones of prospective railway. The Anglo-Turkish negotiations are also approaching completion. Conventions delimit the Aden Hinterland. It is understood that there will be no important changes in the boundary.

The Hedjaz Pilgrims.

Bombay, June 19.

The Report of Dr. Abdul Rahaman on the Haj for the year 1912-13 states that Mecca was infected with cholera from the outset: and though it is impossible to estimate the total mortality even approximately, from 800 to 1,000 are known to have died on one day alone and this death-rate continued for a week. Dr. Abdul Rahaman believes that many of the thousands of deaths that occur in Mecca every year can be prevented with more care and forethought. The Report says that if Indian Muslims decide to come to Arabia they must do so without any idea save that of a resolute performance of religious duty in pursuance of which they must be ready to face certain hardships and not unlikely death. Dr. Abdul Rahaman points out that no funds will suffice to provide passages annually to such large number of pauper pilgrims, especially as that number is increasing every year; and he is convinced that the system of compulsory return-tickets is the only possible solution of this difficulty.

Poona, June 17.

Mr. Tilak, who arrived here this morning at 12-45, was brought by the Madras Mail up to Madapsar station where he and the party of Police officials accompanying him got down. From thence he was motored to his residence in Poona city in company with Mr. Guider and Inspector Sadawartay.

Poona, June 17.

A continuous stream of callers from early morning waited on Mr. Tilak to-day as the news of his arrival in Poona spread through the town. All the chief Police officials went through the city to see that there might be no disturbance but nothing out of common occurred. The fact that Mr. Tilak was to be released was kept secret. Mr. Tilak says that he left Mandalay on Monday afternoon, the 8th instant, and reached Rangoon early next morning. He was immediately taken on board a launch which conveyed him to an R. I. M. steamer sailed for Madras the same day. The voyage to Madras occupied nearly eight days and on landing Monday night, the 15th instant, he was put aboard the mail train for Poona accompanied by a Police escort. Instead of coming on to Poona the mail train was stopped at Madapsar, a small roadside station a couple of miles from Poona, last night and Mr. Tilak was asked to alight. He was met by Mr. Guider, Asstt. to the I. G. of Police and the head of the C. I. D. who with another officer took him in a motor car to his residence in the city which he reached about 1 this morning. It was only this morning that the people in the city learned that Mr. Tilak had returned. Further enquiries go to show that there is, however, no truth whatsoever in the report that Mr. Tilak spent two days on board the steamer at Madras. While at Mandalay he devoted most of his time to reading and writing and he has written two or three volumes of works which are still incomplete.

Bombay, June 17.

The Advocate of India understands that Mr. B. G. Tilak will be proceeding to England shortly to instruct Counsel in the appeal that is now pending before the Privy Council in the well-known Tai Maharaja's adoption case in which Mr. Tilak was one of the Trustees. In connection with this case Mr. Tilak was once sentenced to imprisonment for six months but was acquitted on appeal by Sir Lawrence Jenkins who was then the Chief Justice of Bombay.

Bombay, June 17.

It is expected that Mr. Tilak will spend several years in Germany devoting the remainder of his life to writing books.

It is stated that Mr. Tilak has written three books during his detention at Mandalay and they will be published at Poona.

Indians in Canada.

Victoria, June 18.

Owners of "Komagata Maru" have emphatically cabled recalling vessel.

Victoria, June 18.

The Captain of the "Komagata" will ask for a hundred marines from the Japanese cruisers to keep order on the return journey of the rejected Indian emigrants.

Victoria, June 20.

There is no immediate prospect of a return of the "Komagata Maru" to the East. Indians are controlling the situation and refusing to allow the captain to sail. They are determined to test the exclusion of Asiatics in the courts.

The Government of British Columbia is entertaining the Japanese cruisers "Asama" and "Azum" Rear-Admiral Kuroi paid a visit to the Lieutenant-Governor and was given a public welcome with a guard of honour. The crews of the vessels have been given a civic banquet.—Reuter.

Ottawa, June 23.

The Dominion Government has received a telegram from Mr. Stevens, member for Vancouver, intimating that the situation in connection with the Hindus on board the "Komagata Maru" is so serious that it may necessitate the calling out of the Militia. Sir Robert Borden is giving the matter his personal attention.

Victoria, June 23.

At a meeting of eight hundred Vancouver Hindus and two hundred White sympathisers it was urged that the Dominion Government should save the Indians from the highbanded action of the Immigration Department. The Hindus would never forget nor would they forgive the authorities if the immigration situation was not remedied. The meeting decided to send telegrams to Mr. Borden and Lord Crewe to this effect.

Meanwhile further orders have reached Mr. Yamamoto, the Captain of the "Komagata Maru" to return to Kobe immediately but the problem of getting the ship away is now nearer solution.

Our London Letter.

London, June 5.

MR. JINNAH AND THE COUNCIL OF INDIA BILL.

I have already sent you Mr. M. A. Jinnah's interview in the Daily Telegraph, which was given prior to the formal introduction of the Council of India Bill in the House of Lords by Lord Crewe. Since the provisions of the Bill have been disclosed, bitter disappointment is being felt here by many leading representatives of Indian opinion. Lord Crewe's request last autumn for suggestions from responsible Indian quarters was heartily welcomed, but the hopes thus raised have been shattered by the publication of the text of the Bill.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah, in conversation with a Daily News representative, has emphasised some points in the new situation which has been created.

"True," is Mr. Jinnah's comment, "the Bill does propose to introduce the elective principle, but it is only a principle on paper, so to speak. Should the Secretary of State be led to select from the panel nominated by non-official members of the Legislative Councils, our position will actually be worse than at present, for we shall be told that the men selected under this system are our representatives, a pretence that cannot now be made. It should be remembered that nominated non-official members often display less independence than official members, because they are eager to show the Government how keenly they appreciate the honour of nomination."

Something, or somebody, in Mr. Jinnah's opinion, must have "frightened" Lord Crewe, for the Bill practically sets aside the principle of election admitted by eminent statesmen as far back as 1858, when the only objection urged was that there was no electorate, an objection which can no longer be raised.

"We are confident," adds Mr. Jinnah, "that the Secretary of State for the time being will do what is right if only he has the right information before him. But how can he expect to obtain correct information from the representatives of the Indian people who do not really represent anybody but themselves?" The Press Laws, the passage of a measure for compulsory elementary education, and the separation of the executive and the judiciary are three subjects upon which Mr. Jinnah feels that the Government of India is specially in need of advice from those who are in close touch with the mind of the nation.

The Times of last Wednesday also publishes a long statement by Mr. Jinnah in connection with the Bill. "India," says Mr. Jinnah, "is perhaps the only member of the British Empire without any real representation, and the only civilized country in the world that has no real system of representative Government."

"The news of the intention of reform and reorganization of the Council of the Secretary of State for India raised great hopes amongst the people of India, and a very moderate and reasonable demand was put forward that one-third of the total number of the Council should be Indian members, to be elected or chosen by ballot by the elected members of the various Legislative Councils in India. This demand was embodied in the resolutions that were passed by two of the most representative and the greatest organizations of public opinion in India—viz.; the Indian National Congress and the All-India Moslem League—at their Sessions last Christmas. Further, the Indian National Congress, in response to the express desire of Lord Crewe, who was good enough to say that he would welcome any criticism or fresh ideas which might be brought forward on the subject, sent a deputation, which waited on him last month, when I had the honour to place our views before him.

"Now that the Bill to amend the laws as to the Council of India has been introduced and gone through the first reading, I cannot but say that the provisions contained therein are most disappointing, and I feel sure that that is how the people of India will receive it. What hope can measures like this inspire in the people of India who are looking forward to bigger and more substantial reforms in time to come when in matters such as the reform of the Council of the Secretary of State for India, which is, after all, more advisory in its character than anything else, the just proposals of the deputation appointed by the Indian National Congress have not been accepted.

"First of all, there will be only two Indian members, and not one-third of the total number; the minimum number being seven and maximum 10: so the demand for three Indian members is rejected.

"Secondly, the Bill denies the election of the Indian members for all practicable purposes. The Secretary of State for India, under the provisions of the Bill, shall select Indian members from amongst the persons whose names appear on the list of persons domiciled in India, chosen for the purpose by members (other than the official members) of the Legislative Councils. The Governor-General, Governors, Lieutenant-Governors, and the Chief Commissioners, in such manner, subject to such conditions and restrictions, and in such number as may be prescribed by regulations to be made by the Secretary of State for India in Council or by directions issued by the Secretary of State thereunder.

"Now, there is no doubt that what appears at the first blush on paper to be some sort of principle of election is for all practical purposes illusory; and the so-called list, or, to put it in other words, panel, is to be formed by the choice of non-official members of various Councils. This sounds as if the officials will have no voice in the choosing of the list or the forming of the panel, but anyone who knows the actual constitution of the various Legislative Councils will see at once that the non-official members means elected as well as members nominated by the Government in various parts of India (that is, the officials in the country), and there is a large number of such members in various Councils who are bound in the very nature of things to follow the behest of the official class, and this class of nominated members will have a very potent voice in the formation of the panel; to say nothing of a certain element of even elected members who will not be able to exercise free and independent judgment for personal reasons. The consequence of this will be that a large number will get on to that list or panel who would be pure creatures of the official class and not the representatives of the people, and this might be worse if the rules, regulations, conditions, and restrictions mentioned in the Bill are not most carefully framed. Therefore, what appears on paper to be a list of men chosen by the people will be so in name only; nay, worse, because at present the Indian members are nominated, whereas under the Bill it will be said that they are the representatives of the people, although the selection of the Secretary of State for India might fall on those of the list who may be pure creatures of the official class.

"If the principle of election is to be accepted, why whittle it away by adopting the most circuitous and clumsy methods? By far the simplest way is to form an electorate which is ready-made, consisting of all the elected members of the various Councils referred to in the Bill and let them elect the Indian representatives by ballot. If there is any fear of any undesirable man being elected, for which I do not think there is the slightest ground, I should be willing, if necessary, to give the Secretary of State for India, who is always an eminent statesman whichever party he belongs to, the power to veto it and direct a fresh election in that particular case; but anything short of this will, I feel sure, not satisfy the people of India.

"With regard to the other provisions of the Bill it is not very clear as to exactly what is intended, because in introducing the Bill Lord Crewe did not make any statement.

"They require some further explanation before one can deal with the provisions contained therein, and therefore I do not propose to say anything about them now, but it is most important to see that proper rules and regulations are framed as contemplated by the Bill."

THE PROBLEM OF INDIA.

Indian matters have been very prominent this week in the London Press. Mrs. Annie Besant's striking letter in the Times has drawn a lengthy but feeble reply from the pen of Miss Cornelia Sorabji, whose line of argument cannot fail to impress those, who are keenly following the controversy, with the fact that she seems to be altogether remote from the very spirit of the people of India. The Times has also written a leading article on the subject and, though naturally it does not find itself in agreement with Mrs. Besant's views, it tries to treat the question seriously, but curiously enough, not too seriously, as has been the traditional custom of this journal.

Mrs. Besant has likewise contributed a remarkable article to the Nation. "It is a remarkable comment," she proceeds, "on the curious indifference of England to her 'great Dependency' that, in all the discussions now rife on the question of the Federation of the Empire, India is quietly left on one side..... There is a general vague idea that India is a conquered country, that she is held by the sword, that she is more or less barbarous, and does not count when Imperial questions are to the front..... So the British nation blunders along after its wont and is risking the loss of the noblest opportunity a people have ever had of building a world-Empire so mighty that it could impose peace on the world, and is tending steadily towards a war of white and coloured, in which Asia, indignant at long exploitation and injustice, shall be pitted against Europe and America..... Now India does not desire to shatter her allegiance to the Crown, but she passionately desires the removal of the laws which cramp and fetter her; she demands self-government within the Empire, and she is resolute to win it..... Will not Great Britain consider what Indians ought to do? If they are to be shut in within the limits of India, and to be denied the ordinary human right to travel freely in other lands, may they not fairly claim at least to have their own land to themselves and to shut all white men out of it? Is it surprising that a murmur is making itself heard to shut out all Colonials? ...

..... The only intelligent loyalty to the British Government in India is that of the educated classes; they desire self-government, but self-government within the Empire. England has taught them to love liberty, to admire free institutions, and they look to England to carry out in India all that she elsewhere declares is essential to national and individual self-respect. Their faith in her professions is shaken, but is not yet destroyed; they are still willing to be guided in their building-up of free institutions by the experience of the English, but they demand that the building shall proceed. How is this educated class being treated? There is the Press Act, to which their consent was gained by a promise that the High Court would redress any wrong—a promise shown to be illusory. This Act is administered harshly against Hindus and Mahomedans, but is a dead letter when English-edited papers stir up hatred against Indians..... There is nothing in all this which borders on sedition, which deservedly causes suspicion and distrust. Nothing is more dangerous, more disloyal to the Empire, than the flouting of this splendid class of patriotic men, and the constant misrepresentation of their aims and conduct. For the sake of England as much as for the sake of India, their co-operation and advice should be sought and welcomed; for the stability of British rule in India depends on them."

Mrs. Besant has also written an equally forcible article in the Daily Chronicle on the same question. She has roused the innermost conscience of the British public by her splendid and brilliant advocacy of the Indian cause—for which we cannot be too grateful. Mrs. Besant is delivering a special lecture on "India's plea for justice: Shall India be a buttress or a peril to the Empire?" at Queen's Hall on the 11th instant.

MR. MAZHAR-UL-HAQUE ON "INDIAN NATIONALISM."

Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque delivered an address on "Indian Nationalism" at a meeting of the London Indian Association at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on the 30th May, Dr. J. N. Mehta presiding.

Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque, who was received with great enthusiasm, said that he had not intended to indulge in public speaking during his visit to this country, but he had felt unable to resist the temptation which the Association had put in his way. He was conscious that he had chosen a difficult subject. The word Nationalism had somehow acquired a sinister meaning in India. The moment an Indian called himself a Nationalist, he was apt to be branded as disloyal by the Anglo-Indian Press of the country. ("Shame.") Still, he was speaking that night in a free country, and he proposed to be both blunt and direct in what he had to say. (Cheers.) By Indian Nationalist he meant an Indian who put the welfare of his country before any other consideration, who longed to see his motherland not only self-respecting but respected by other nations, who, when the time came, would be ready for any sacrifice. He had not been more than a few weeks in England, and he was proud to find his fellow-countrymen here and hoped that when they returned to their motherland, they would lose none of the enthusiasm which now animated them. What was the obstacle in the way of Nationalism in India? He wished to blame no one, but they must blame themselves. The wretched sectarianism which was rampant in India—he did not care whether it was Hindus or Mohomedans who were responsible—had done much to injure the advance of Nationalism. It had been his lot to fight sectarianism all his life and he would continue the struggle until his last hour. He was not there to apportion blame between Hindus and Mohomedans. In his view they were equally at fault. If the history of India for the past fifty years was studied, it would be found that it was principally made up of a political see-saw, in which Hindus and Mohomedans went alternately up and down. In 1857 the Mohomedans were in the bad books of the Government; then came the turn of the Hindus; and, finally, the awakening represented by the Congress movement. It was possible that the Congress had not made such progress as some would wish; and he himself would like it to advance much more. But let them not be ungrateful or forgetful of the fact that when their leaders started the Congress movement, India was otherwise without a voice.

India, he felt, underwent the deepest humiliation when the Mohomedans stood aloof from the movement. It was a great mistake on their part. As they knew, he had appeared on the platforms of both the Congress and the Moslem League; and his sole object in belonging to both bodies was to bring them together. He felt it to be the bounden duty of his community to join in the work of uplifting their common motherland. The Mohomedans were utterly mistaken if they thought that they would always remain the pampered pets of the Government. He was afraid also that his Hindu friends would fall into the same error, if they were not careful. He would speak plainly. During the last two years when the Mohomedans had been down upon their luck, he had come across those who were jubilant over their misfortunes. They must guard against such a falling back upon the old ways. Why had the two communities any quarrel with each other? He knew of no substantial reason to account for it. There was no question in India—no political question at all events—in which the interests of both communities were not equally involved, and with regard to which they differed. There was too much intemperate language on both sides. He remembered an occasion when a great leader of the Mohomedan community issued a manifesto in which he declared that if special consideration was not shown to Moslem interest, millions of them would turn their backs upon India and emigrate. On the other hand, it was common talk among Hindus that the Mohomedans were foreigners in India. Such wild talk was greatly to be deprecated. What Hindus rightly objected to was the separation of the two communities. They must unite. If one took a step forward the other should take two. As far as he himself was concerned, he would much rather be represented on Council by his friend Mr. Gokhale than by anyone else. Their interests were practically identical. India stood in need of a single organization which would unite all Indians, of whatever caste and creed, in a common bond. A struggle was certain to come between the bureaucracy and the Indian people. It was, unfortunately, the case that on every burning question there was a marked antagonism between the people and the ruling class. Englishmen could be found who were sympathetic towards Indian aspirations and supported their demands. But, generally speaking, from one end of India to the other, Anglo-Indians and Indians were in opposite camps. Every demand was met by an immediate negative. And yet there could be no going back. Some said that it was a mistake to give India national education; but education had to come, whether Western or Eastern, and when once education entered, there could only be one result. Equality of treatment must be insisted upon, and until the ruling class in India modified their attitude—of which he had little hope—the struggle would be bitter, and it was not far off. Let Indians, therefore, prepare themselves for it by creating a solid wall of united public opinion which could not be broken. At present there seemed to be too many leaders. No one could foresee how many years it would take to raise India to the place which she ought to occupy among the nations of the world. But the work would never be accomplished without determination, enthusiasm, and sheer force of character. It required courage in these days of Press Law to stand up against injustice in India. But that was the spirit in which he hoped those before him would return to their country. He looked forward with confidence to the future which lay in their hands; and he wished them all success. (Cheers.)

MR. MAZHAR-UL-HAQUE ENTERTAINED IN LONDON.

Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque left London yesterday morning for Paris en route for India. On the eve of his departure, he was entertained at a largely-attended reception by Mr. Zafar Ali Khan at Caxton Hall on Wednesday afternoon. Among those present were Princess Sophia Dhuleep Singh, Sir Henry Cotton, K. C. S. I., Mr. Skeine, Mr. Samarth, Dr. V. H. Rutherford, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Mrs. Roy, Col. and Mrs. Warliker, Col. and Mrs. Bhola Nath, Mr. Khwaja Kamaluddin, Mr. Sarferaz Hossain, Mr. F. D. Ahmed, Mr. Asaf Ali, Mr. Syed Hossain, Dr. John Pollen, Mr. F. Hugh O'Donnell, Mr. L. S. Pershad, Mr. Jelal Shah, Ali Hikmet Nahid Bey, Mr. H. W. Nevins, Mr. S. H. Swinny, Mr. W. Douglas Hall, Mr. Polak and Mr. Sinha.

The guest of the afternoon was garlanded by Mrs. Bhola Nath, which graceful act was supplemented by an eloquent tribute to Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque by Mrs. Naidu, Mr. O'Donnell, Dr. Pollen and the host also paid suitable tributes to the disinterested and honest work which Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque has been doing for several years in India and particularly to his persistent efforts in the teeth of opposition, to bring about the desired unity between the two great communities of India. Mr. Haque, who spoke with no little emotion, briefly returned thanks. The guests dispersed at 6-30 p. m.

LECTURE ON THE "GOSPEL OF ISLAM."

Mr. Sarferaz Hossain, who has come over to this country to help the Khwaja Kamaluddin in his missionary work, is giving his first public lecture on the "Gospel of Islam" at Caxton Hall next week. Mr. Ameer Ali will be in the chair.

TETE À TETE

In continuation of the correspondence which we have had with the Private Secretary to H. H. the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, we publish the following letter which we addressed on the 25th instant to him in reply to his letter of the 20th.

Another Unfounded Imputation.

If our suspicion that once more a translator has misled Sir Michael O'Dwyer proves to be well founded, we trust His Honour will make an example of the miscreant who seems to be so determined an enemy of the Press. This the Punjab Government owes to its own reputation for fair dealing with its critics.

"Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of the 19th instant and your confirmatory letter of the 20th.

2. As you may have noticed, I published your telegram in the Comrade of the 20th instant, but your letter was received here too late for insertion or notice in that issue.

3. In para. 3 of my letter of the 17th instant, I had requested you to be good enough to specify on what occasions other than the one now alleged the Comrade had published the insinuation that the Zamindar was "not likely to receive impartial treatment from Sir M. O'Dwyer because his aversion to Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, Editor of the Zamindar, goes back to the days when, at his instance, as British Resident at Hyderabad, Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services were "dispensed with by the late Nizam on the suspicion of having "lamponed Mr. Walker, the Finance Minister."

4. We are glad to note that, although you have not directly stated so, you have practically withdrawn your previous statement that the "insinuation" had "appeared on other occasions" also in the Comrade.

5. But while withdrawing that statement you have substituted another, that the "insinuation" had "appeared also in other papers," and in your letter of the 20th you refer us to the issues of the Hamdard of 25th and 26th April and of the Zamindar of the 12th May last, which, I understand you to mean, are the "other papers" where the "insinuation" had also appeared besides appearing in the Comrade of 2nd May.

6. I am not concerned with what appeared in the Zamindar, but, being the Proprietor and Editor of the Hamdard as well as of the Comrade, I am very much concerned with what appeared in that journal.

7. To the best of my recollection the Hamdard had never even alluded to the rumour that Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services had been dispensed with by the late Nizam at the instance of Sir Michael O'Dwyer; but on perusing your very definite reference to two issues of the Hamdard, I looked into them very carefully and my recollection of it was fully confirmed.

8. The name of Sir Michael O'Dwyer does not occur even once in the two issues referred to by you, nor does that of Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, and naturally there is no allusion either to their respective positions at Hyderabad when they were there. In fact, I also read the next succeeding issue of the Hamdard, dated 28th April, which concluded the Hamdard's comments on the warning to the Zamindar, and found nothing even remotely suggesting the "insinuation."

9. Under these circumstances I am compelled to request you to make your reference still more definite and quote the passage where the "insinuation" alluded to by you is published by the Hamdard.

10. In the issue of the 25th April, (page 4, column 3), however, the following passage occurs:—

زمیندار کی ساتھ جو طرز عمل پنجاب گورنمنٹ کا ایک رہا می اور جو سلوک اوسکی
ساتھ کئی جاچکی ہیں اوپر نظر کرنی ہوی یہ خیال مضحکہ انگیز اور قطعاً ناقابل تسلیم معلوم
ہوتا ہے کہ اسکی ساتھ گورنمنٹ کی جانب سے کوئی عمل حدودی اور قلعہ کی طور پر

11. This is the only passage in which there is a direct reference to the Punjab Government in the course of these articles, and it may be rendered into English as follows:—

"Keeping in view the attitude hitherto observed by the Punjab Government towards the Zamindar and the treatment "that has been meted out to it, the idea that it is possible "for the Government to show any sympathy towards it or "do it a favour appears to be ridiculous and unacceptable."

12. We have no reason to believe that the above passage could have been in your mind when you suggested that the Hamdard also had published the insinuation that the Zamindar "is not likely to "receive impartial treatment from Sir M. O'Dwyer because his aversion to Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, Editor of the Zamindar, goes back to "the days when, at his instance, as British Resident at Hyderabad, "Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's services were dispensed with by the late "Nizam on the suspicion of having lamponed Mr. Walker, the "Finance Minister." But if it was indeed this passage that was in your mind when you wrongly imputed to the Hamdard the publication of the above insinuation, I trust the Hon. Sir Michael O'Dwyer will be pleased to take steps to teach a salutary lesson to the official who was responsible for misleading him with a grossly inaccurate translation, presuming, of course, that it was on a translation that His Honour's understanding was based, and that it was not his unaided judgment that betrayed him into such an imputation against the Hamdard.

13. We have repeatedly invited attention to the evil of undue dependence evidently placed by Government on the official translators, and in particular we have written at length on the gross inaccuracy of the "Abstract Translation" of the Badr article on which the order of Sir Michael O'Dwyer requiring a deposit of Rs. 3,000 as security from that paper was based. Now that we are ourselves a sufferer from this evil we have all the more reason to invite His Honour's attention to the matter. We shall be doing bare justice to Sir Michael in believing that he is as anxious to avoid being misled by wrong translations as the papers that suffer through them. It is, therefore, in this belief that we have taken the liberty of appealing to His Honour to be pleased to take such steps as he thinks fit to teach the translator in this case a salutary lesson.

14. From the foregoing statements you will be able to see that the imputation against the Hamdard contained in your last letter has even less foundation in fact than the imputation against the Comrade contained in your first letter, and we hope and trust that you will be good enough to withdraw both at an early date.

15. We also trust that you will kindly forward copies of our letters to you to the newspapers to whom you have forwarded your letter of the 16th as amended by your letter of the 20th. This is an act of such obviously bare justice that we foresee no objection or reluctance on your part.

I am,
Yours faithfully,
(Sd.) MOHAMED ALI,
Editor of the Comrade and the Hamdard."

We have received a copy of an appeal by 22 Mussalman gentlemen of Behar urging "Brother Moslems" to come forward and found a "Behar Moslem Association."

The promoters of the Association think that "the majority of the Moslem community in Behar do not look with satisfaction upon the aims and ideals which, perhaps noble in themselves and no doubt fascinating to the young, form the chief plank in the All-India Moslem League platform oratory." They say that the majority of the Moslems in the province "hold that an administration based in India on the lines of the self-governing colonies may be a blessing; but agitation for such ideals is beyond the pale of practical politics in India for some-time to come." They would have, therefore, an Association to safeguard Moslem interests, which would keep away from anti-Government agitation and refrain from making "demands at a time or in a manner which might embarrass Government." The promoters of the new "Behar Moslem Association" are at liberty to have their own views about the needs of the Mussalmans of Behar, and they may adopt any methods they please to promote the interests of their co-religionists. We would ask them only one question. Are they sure that the "policy" they have discovered will not condemn them to utter inactivity and impotence from the start? They want to keep away from anti-Government agitation. Will they give us a single instance in which the Moslem League has wantonly embarked on such a course? They will not make a demand that might embarrass Government. Can they think of any circumstances in which a demand from a subject people has not been in some way or other embarrassing to those in power? These self-denying ordinances virtually mean that the Mussalmans of Behar should never have a grievance at all, or should refrain from ever adopting the most effectual methods to remedy it. We had hoped that time had passed for such inanities to be seriously preached anywhere in this country. If the Moslem League ideals are noble in themselves and may sow the seeds of future blessings, we fail to understand what it is in their texture that has scared the new band of "moderates" in Behar. The Moslem League has never asked for self-government on colonial lines, and it has never declared that it could be attained soon and without devoted work and sacrifices by generations of patriotic Indians. According to the brand-new "moderation" of these gentlemen of Behar such ideals will never come "within the pale of practical politics," for practical results have never been the serious concern of the extremists of the "moderation" cult. The world is unfortunately in the habit of moving on, and the hands of the clock can not be put back by every Rip Van Winkle who wakes to find himself out of tune with his surroundings. Among the signatories to the Behar manifesto we find the name of the Hon. Mr. Qamrul Huda. He seemed to hold quite different views when he asked a string of questions relating to the Cawnpore Mosque affair in the Imperial Legislative Council. He would not now think of "embarrassing Government." May we ask to what this change of front is due?

The Pioneer has just lighted on some election irregularities of which a mention has been made in the annual report of the Cawnpore municipality, and taking this as a convenient text, it delivers a mild homily on the need of Indians fitting themselves before they claim "a much larger share in the Government of this Empire." It thinks that the civic spirit in India needs much fostering, but is evidently of opinion that Indians cannot yet be trusted to do the "fostering" themselves. It illustrates its conclusion by the example of children learning to swim. They can not be thrown into deep water to learn the art themselves lest they be drowned in the process. "Indian local rulers are at present still kept in the shallow water with life-belts round them, and so far very few boards show signs of using their limbs in a way that would justify taking them out of their depth." But are they really free to use their limbs? They have not only life-belts round their waists, but veritable mill-stones round their necks and the freedom of their limbs is carefully controlled by sundry other devices. Weighted and bound as they are, they can have little hope of learning to swim till Doomsday. It is ridiculous to deplore the absence of the civic spirit in Indian municipalities because election scandals occasionally come to notice. Much graver scandals come to light during election campaigns among people whose civic spirit and capacity to manage their own affairs are held up to the admiration of Indians. It is equally absurd to suppose that in the existing conditions of so-called local self-government, municipalities offer any scope for the development of a strong and healthy civic spirit. A municipal commissioner, who shows a habit of taking genuine and independent interest in civic affairs, is frequently pulled up through the leading-strings to his senses and he speedily learns how dangerous it is to take himself and his responsibilities seriously. A recent incident at a meeting of the Delhi municipality, when the Vice-President was subjected to a gratuitous insult by Major Cooke-Young, J. M. S., a paid official of the municipality for having dared to suggest economical administration of the department under the charge of that official, shows what risks an independent member must be prepared to face. Again, the recent behaviour of the official chairman of the same municipality, who in a meeting of the committee tore into shreds the report of certain municipal commissioners on some urgent matters relating to municipal economy, in road-making shows how far the municipal "children" in the capital of India are allowed to use their "limbs" in "shallow waters." To make municipal administration in India something of a reality it is absolutely necessary that men of education and independence should enter the boards in larger numbers. They alone can know what use to make of the "life-belts" and the "leading-strings" that a grandmotherly Government has provided for their safety. In the presence of members of this type, the Delhi Health Officer would have been sent about his business, and we are sure Mr. Connolly, the chairman, would have brought into use his best set of manners instead of the worst. But perhaps the Pioneer's conception of civic spirit would not exactly be like that of such members.

DR. ABDUR RAHMAN, Vice-Consul of Jeddah, is evidently the official expert engaged in the solution of the Haj question. The latest report that he has furnished to the Government on the subject, a summary of which is published elsewhere, gives some measure of his fitness to be entrusted with a task of such delicacy and importance. The report deals with the traffic of the year 1912-13, when, it is stated, Mecca was infected with cholera. It says that from 800 to 1000 pilgrims "are known to have died on one day alone." It further says that "if Indian Moslems decide to come to Arabia they must do so without any idea save that of a resolute performance of religious duty in pursuance of which they must be ready to face certain hardships and not unlikely death." We do not know if anything could exceed the fatuity and presumption of this egregious warning. Does this consular official, who is apparently a Mussalman, think that Moslem pilgrims go to Mecca for any idea other than "that of a resolute performance of religious duty?" Most of the pilgrims are poor; in many cases they part cheerfully with their worldly possessions; they willingly risk their lives and are ready to face the dangers of a perilous journey. Do these thousands of devout worshippers, whose inner faith lights their path to distant Ka'ba that they may come nearer in worship to their Creator, go there to hunt for safe emoluments or conduct an underhand lucrative business? To warn a Mussalman of the danger of death in this connection is a gratuitous insult which this Moslem doctor of all men has dared to offer. Had he known Islam and the spirit that moves the thousands of Mussalmans who annually go to the holy places, he would have refrained from uttering a warning that every Mussalman would resent. To quote Iqbal:

آئی میں آبِ لیلیٰ شفا کا پیام کیا * رکھی میں اہل درد مسیحی سی کام کیا

The Vice-Consul recommends the system of compulsory return-tickets to obviate the problem of "pauper pilgrims." We have already said more than once that such a system will not meet the needs of the situation and in any case it would never be acceptable to Mussalmans. We trust the Government would avoid all such actions as are sure to create misunderstandings and may possibly lead to undesirable consequences. We are awaiting the publication of the results of the Government inquiry into the Haj question, and may only hope at present that no decision will be taken on the basis of the report of a Vice-Consul who happens to be a Mussalman, but has apparently no knowledge either of Moslem feelings or of the requirements of Hedjaz pilgrims. He was thanked confidentially by Sir Edward Grey last year for unknown services. Now he has been made a Khan Bahadur by the Indian Government. Is it because his peculiar interest in the Haj question and his views on the subject have met with official approval?

THE Honours List of 22nd June is more than usually a featureless document, and contains few distinctions that are likely to excite public interest. The Honours. Statesman's lament over the Government's habit of mainly decorating its officials on such occasions is a tame echo of the general public feeling in India, which is at least as old as the habit itself. The Statesman's chief concern, however, is to press the claims of the non-official Europeans of Calcutta for official recognition. With a wider outlook it could not have failed to be impressed with the systematic ignoring in this respect of most of the Indian public men who enjoy the respect and confidence of the country and are spending their lives in its service. But this is an old complaint, and we need not think the Indian Honours Lists have now much power left in them to surprise anybody by the extent of their omissions. They are no better than they are generally expected to be, and one feels genuine consolation after one has run through a List without meeting many "sins of commission." The latest honours, however, contain certain names which cannot be passed over without some notice. Among the newly created Khan Bahadurs there may be many persons who have deserved their titles by useful services to the State, but we will be delighted to know what services have earned for M. Mohamed Ali Khan, retired Deputy Collector of Cawnpore, his Khan Bahadurship. This gentleman acquired some notoriety during the Cawnpore mosque troubles and the local Mussalmans viewed his conduct with considerable mistrust. There were strong rumours, which gained much credence at the time, that his agents were the authors of letters received by the mutawallis of the mosque urging them to accept the plot of land offered by the Government in compensation for the portion of the mosque that was demolished, because otherwise the plot in question would be acquired by the Hindus for their temple. Whether the retired Deputy Collector and Hon. Magistrate had any hand in the game we can not positively say, but it is certain that his attitude aroused the strong suspicions of the Mussalmans, and he has never enjoyed their confidence. In any case we would like to know what new services have been rendered by this old official of Government, who retired on a pension some years ago and whose services were not considered worthy of a Khan Bahadurship even on the eve of his retirement. Similarly the gift of a Khan Sahibship to the present Tahsildar of Cawnpore is a reward for services about the nature of which considerable curiosity is bound to be felt. More Mussalmans rejoice perhaps in the title of Sardar Sahab conferred on Mr. Ganda Singh the Cawnpore Jailor whose humanity touched the accused in the Mosque Case deeply. Another Khan Bahadurship, that gives one food for reflection, is that conferred on Dr. Abdur Rahman of Jeddah fame, whose Vice-Consular exploits are noted elsewhere. Frankly, the Mussalman public will have to considerably revise its notions of public service before it understands the true inwardness of the merits of these gentlemen. If the real servants of the public are not deserving of generous official recognition, one can hardly see the propriety of honouring such Government officials whose conduct has often given rise to widespread public mistrust.

We warn the C. I. D. that a terrible conspiracy is being hatched at Delhi under the very nose of the police the members of which are exceedingly numerous and fairly well off. A sinister feature of the movement is that all communities are adequately represented. The object of the conspirators is clearly homicidal, and so bold have they grown that they have thrown off all secrecy and openly announce their murderous intent. In fact, the sentence beginning with: "The man I want to kill", is a sort of password of the Society. But they do not name the object of their hatred. They generally describe him, and he seems to be the miscreant who cuts off electric power that works their fans at odd intervals every day. As a rule it is somewhere about two in the afternoon, when they have just begun to enjoy their seista, or later when they have just come out of the bath and are dressing to go out or dressing for dinner. It is rumoured that Mr. Griffin, the Manager of the Electric Tramways Company, which is responsible for this playfulness, was so often tempted to join this homicidal movement himself that he betook himself to Samla to keep half the Himalayan range between himself and temptation. But such self-control is not within the power of all. Mr. Griffin's company gets its dues just the same and probably he gets, besides his regular salary, a good round sum as a bonus at the end of the year. But the other would-be homicides pay for the power as well as for the playfulness of the Company's men, or machines, or whoever, or whatever it be that cuts off the power and leaves the fans in the ceiling like so many stable aeroplanes on a small scale. And the rate is ruinous. In Calcutta the company charges six annas a unit for light and three annas a unit for fans. But in Delhi, with its "salubrious climate during seven months of the year" and its "health during the other five, the Electric Tramways Company charges six annas a unit for fans as well. This is just the way to tempt people to commit murder. We must frankly tell the Company's management that if they insist on being nasty, they shall at least be cheap.

A CORRESPONDENT whose deep interest in, and wide study of, Indian history are well-known, refers to an episode recorded by Manucci which throws light on the attitude of Aurangzeb towards that ancient Hindu institution, the Sati. Some chroniclers, moved by hatred and bigotry, have depicted Aurangzeb as a religious zealot who carried on throughout his reign a systematic persecution of Hindus. The falsehoods of history have, by facile and frequent repetition, come to be accepted as verified statements of fact, and the character of one of the most enlightened and just rulers and earnest reformers of his times has been revealed in its true light to the driven, credulous and uncritical generations of modern India. If one could freely detach himself from the prejudices and belief, noisy faction cries of the day and try to see Aurangzeb as he actually was apart from the monstrous myths that have grown up round his name in later times, it would not be difficult to see the greatest of the Great Moguls in his vast stature as a man and a ruler, conscious of his vast burden, of the growing distemper of the age, bracing himself up, alone and without any hope of finding men of equal resolution and foresight to help him, to pull a great empire together and strengthen its foundations by inspiring the ruling class and the people alike with a sense of duty, by social purification, by defining civil rights and ensuring justice. The incident recorded by Manucci relates to a case of Sati which ultimately led Aurangzeb to issue an edict totally prohibiting the practice. It was not an act of a bigot, but of a humane ruler who could not but be moved by the horror of such a social practice. The episode related by Manucci is as follows:—"During my stay in Agra I went one day to make an excursion into the country on horseback, in the company of a young Armenian. We came where a Hindu woman had begun to move round her pyre, which was already blazing; she rested her eyes on us, as if she appealed to us for help. The Armenian asked if I would join him in saving the woman from death. I said I would. Seizing our swords, and our servants doing the same, we charged our horses into the midst of the crowd looking on, shouting 'Mata, Mata!' ('kill, kill!'), where—at the Brahmans, being frightened, all took to flight and left the woman unguarded. The Armenian laid hold of her, and making her mount behind him, carried her off. Subsequently, having had her baptised, he married her. When I passed through Surat I found her living there with her son, and she returned me many thanks for the benefit done to her. When the King returned from Kashmir, the Brahmans went to complain that the soldiers did not allow women to be burnt, in accordance with their customs. The King issued an order that in all lands under Mogul control never again should the officials allow a woman to be burnt. This order endures to this day." As our correspondent says, Manucci is not an historian of any merit, but he was a confirmed hater of Aurangzeb and it is, therefore, something to find him noticing Aurangzeb's action in this instance with evident satisfaction.

The Comrade.

Aligarh and its Present Official Patron.

We read in the Tribune of the 26th instant that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces will visit Aligarh from July 16th to 18th as Patron of the Aligarh College to discuss with the Trustees "complications which have recently arisen regarding the Shihh-Sunni question," and Government's special building grant.

So far as the Government's grant is concerned, it may perhaps be useful to mention that His Honour had recently deputed Mr. Gaskell, a U. P. official, to examine the finances of the College—a proceeding that has never had a precedent—before permitting the College to avail itself of the Government's special grant allotted to it as long as three years ago for constructing a new school building. We should have thought that the official deputed by His Honour would have satisfied him that there was no harm in permitting the College to draw that money; but it would now seem that His Honour must himself take the trouble of coming over to Aligarh and discussing the matter with the Trustees.

We shall discuss the Budget Estimates of the College for the year 1914-15 in some detail in a subsequent issue. But we may mention here that the actual revenue during the year 1913-14 was Rs. 2,40,844, while the actual expenditure was Rs. 2,56,135, resulting in a deficit of Rs. 15,291. But it should be noted that last year the College had budgeted for a deficit of Rs. 14,478, and that if three annual grants of Rs. 10,000, Rs. 6,000 and Rs. 1,200 of H.H. the Aga Khan, the Khairpur State, and Messrs. Jamal Brothers respectively, had been paid in when due, there would have been a small surplus instead of a deficit. For the current year the Honorary Secretary, who has laboured incessantly at financial reform and deserves the genuine gratitude of all interested in the Aligarh College, estimates the revenue at Rs. 2,93,268 and the expenditure at Rs. 2,88,260. There will thus be a surplus of ten thousand rupees as against a deficit of fifteen thousand rupees last year. It is, however, true that the estimated surplus is due to the expected payment within the year of arrears of various grants some of which we have mentioned above, and that in reality the revenue proper of the year will be short of the year's expenditure by some fifteen thousand rupees.

This is by no means a satisfactory state of affairs; but those "friends of Aligarh" who offer it their advice in season and out of season must console themselves with the reflection that this unhappy result is the direct outcome of their persuading the Secretary of State to announce through the Government of India his so-called final decisions about the Moslem University two years ago. The University project had thrown the daily increasing needs of the College into the background; but the Trustees had found ample compensation for this temporary embarrassment in the hope and belief that in a year or two the College would blossom forth into a University with an income of five lakhs. Well, the University is not yet within sight, and if you go to a Mussalman to get even a small contribution for the College, you hear some very nasty things even if you escape battery and assault.

But is it kind of Government to inflict on the College the further injury of withholding grants allotted more than three years ago on the plea that the finances of the College are not as flourishing as they should be? Well may the Trustees say: "Thou, too, O Brutus!" But perhaps this was only to be expected when proposals had been put forward, though happily in vain, for closing the College for a year and stopping the Government grant because some Trustees of the College had not approved of the Cawnpore Sacrilege about this time last year.

Well, we think the Mussalmans can dispense with doles so grudgingly given, though we claim the grants of the Government as the patrimony of the people, rather than as largess doled out by official almoners. Let the Government tell the Mussalmans plainly enough that they need expect nothing from it so long as they grieve over demolished mosques, and we are certain that money will be found by those who hold their mosques as sacred not only to re-build their mosques but also to erect schools and colleges.

There is one Mussalman, however, whose disillusionment must by now be complete, and that is the Honorary Secretary of the College. This is no time for mutual recriminations but for solidarity and co-operation. The Mussalmans in general and the Trustees in particular must offer unstinted support to him, for we feel sure he needs it and would be genuinely grateful for it. He could never have expected that within the short space of a year the whirligig of time would bring him face to face with such difficulties, most of them assisted if not created by the very people to win whose support he had come into conflict with the public opinion of his community.

But the financial embarrassment of the Honorary Secretary is as nothing compared with the embarrassment due to the new sectarianism with which he has to deal. We have already had to refer to this new difficulty more than once, but we have preferred to offer no opinion on the merits of the question for the simple reason that the Trustees still have the matter in hand. As we pointed out in our issue of 23rd May, a sub-committee consisting of three Shiah and three Sunni Trustees has been appointed by the Trustees to go into the matter most thoroughly, and we still believe that the Moslem public would do well to reserve its comment till the Trustees have formulated their own solution of the problem. There would then be time enough to criticise, and the criticism is then likely to be both informed and useful. Our appeal to the Mussalmans that their good-sense will be fully equal to the delicate nature of the work which the Trustees have in hand has so far been amply responded to, and we trust the same response will continue to be made hereafter when the difficulties of Trustees have every appearance of increasing.

The question, we may explain, arose out of a pamphlet prepared and circulated by the Secretary of the Shiah Conference some three years ago, in which he had set forth complaints under various heads about arrangements alleged to be prejudicial to the Shiah students and Shiah members of the staff. Most of the Trustees of the College who had received this pamphlet were of opinion that no notice should be taken of it, because in their opinion it betrayed a spirit of dissension to be created by means of preposterous demands likely to give rise to bad blood between the two great sects of the Mussalmans, rather than a desire for unity to be maintained by means of removing all causes of sectarian friction. Others, however, held that whenever complaints about College arrangements were seriously brought to the notice of the Trustees, it was their duty to look into them and to dispose of them according to the result of their inquiries. The Shiah Conference was a body of recent origin, and, so far as outsiders could judge, a strong body of educated Shiah opinion, more than usually independent of Shiah theologians in judgment, had appeared to show considerable distrust of this body. But what would have passed in a Shiah as independence of judgment might possibly have been condemned in a Sunni as sectarian prejudice, and we think that the Trustees were right to be persuaded by a minority of theirs which included Sunnis as well as Shiahs that the complaints set forth in the pamphlet of the Secretary of the Shiah Conference should be examined and reported upon to the Board of Trustees. A sub-committee, consisting of Nawab Naseer Hussain Khan Sahib Ahyal, Mir Ashiq Ali Sahib, Khalifa Syed Hamid Hussain Sahib, Sahebzada Aftab Ahmad Khan Sahib, Maulvi Habib-ur-Rahman Khan Sahib Shirwani, and Mr. Mohamed Ali, was therefore appointed in the Budget Meeting of the Trustees last year, and apparently met with the approval of both the Shiah and the Sunni members of the Board who had voted on the motion.

It is a matter of deep regret to us and must be so to the entire Moslem community that no meeting of this sub-committee has yet been held. First of all two members of the sub-committee, Nawab Naseer Hussain Khan Sahib Ahyal and Mr. Mohamed Ali were out of India for a time. But when on their return a date was fixed in January this year, Mir Ashiq Ali Sahib resigned on account of old age. His place was filled by the election of Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami, and a date was fixed in March last for the first meeting. This time Khalifa Syed Hamid Hussain Sahib resigned on the ground of the exigencies of his service, and on the initiative of the Honorary Secretary of the Trustees, Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Sahib Qazilbash was appointed to fill the vacancy with his own previous consent.

After this a date was fixed in April last for the meeting, but in the meantime a most regrettable incident occurred in the College. On the Chiklam a meeting was held there, which was addressed by Maulana Syed Sibt-i-Hasan Sahib, a well-known and gifted Shiah divine. At something that fell from the speaker, which is alleged to have had some reference to the comparative merits of the Imams in the Shiah hierarchy and others, a matter on which differences of opinion do prevail between the two sects, the Sunni Head Clerk of the Principal is alleged to have left the Hall with an insulting reference to the reverend speaker. On the following Friday in the course of his sermon after the service, Maulana Syed Sulaiman Ashraf Sahib, the Sunni teacher of divinity and preacher in the College, is alleged to have dealt with improper asperity with the above-mentioned remark of Maulana Syed Sibt-i-Hasan Sahib. This incident was instantly dealt with by the Trustees resident at Aligarh, and we understand that so far as the Shiah students and resident Trustees were concerned the incident was closed after the explanations and very proper expressions of regret by the Sunni preacher and Head Clerk.

Probably in ignorance of this settlement, Nawab Syed Naseer Hussain Khan Sahib Ahyal, a Shiah gentleman with whom no one who knows him would associate any sectarian bias, expressed a desire to resign his membership of the sub-committee for the formation of which he had himself moved the Trustees, unless one of the two alleged Sunni delinquents was suspended and the other dismissed. On learning this the Honorary Secretary, very rightly we think, pressed the Nawab Sahib not to resign, but to visit Aligarh and to acquaint himself with the real facts of the case, and requested him in no case to mix up with the inquiry into a series of complaints of a more permanent nature his natural resentment on hearing allegations about an isolated incident however grave. Nawab Naseer Hussain Khan Sahib visited Aligarh, and on the 12th April as many as 17 Trustees, including the Hon. Justice Hasan Imam, met and considered the question. We are happy to note that perfect unanimity prevailed, and with the consent of Nawab Naseer Hussain Khan Sahib the 11th of May and following dates were fixed for the meeting of the sub-committee.

But if the Trustees believed that at last there was nothing more between this decision and the inquiry of the sub-committee, they were doomed to an early disappointment. Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Sahib Qazilbash was informed of the date of the meeting along with other members of the sub-committee, but failing to get an acknowledgment of this intimation, the Honorary Secretary repeatedly telegraphed to Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Sahib, and when on his return from Rampur he stayed at Aligarh for the day, he was informed by the Honorary Secretary personally also. Even on this he only promised to communicate his decision subsequently by letter. Finally, Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami was requested to obtain his decision by corresponding with him, and succeeded in doing so. The Nawab Sahib fixed the 25th and 26th May for meetings of the sub-committee in a letter which he wrote to Major Bilgrami on the 1st of May. But in a letter addressed to the Honorary Secretary two days later he for the first time re-opened the whole question, and it is necessary that we should refer in detail to his new demands.

His first demand was for a fresh inquiry into the Chiklam incident and the punishment of the delinquents as a condition precedent of his participation in the sub-committee's inquiry. His second demand was the appointment of a fresh sub-committee the Shiah members of which, whether Trustees or not, were to be only those whom the Shiah Ulama were to accept. This was to be presided over, he it noted, by a non-Moslem Visitor of the College or by its Official Patron. But if these proposals were not acceptable, the Nawab Sahib said that he would work on the sub-committee already appointed by the Trustees, provided that the numbers of Shiahs and Sunnis should be equal—which, in the light of existing facts, we can only interpret as a disapproval of the Honorary Secretary's membership of the sub-committee ex-officio, on the ground that he would be the fourth Sunni as compared with only three Shiahs—and provided that guarantees were given that the Board of Trustees "on which there was a majority of Sunnis" would accept the recommendations of the sub-committee.

It is indeed regrettable that a Trustee who had opposed every reform in the Constitution of the Trustees and had thus repeatedly expressed his confidence in the existing Board of Trustees should so readily denounce it now as a body of narrow-minded and prejudiced sectarians who could not be trusted to do justice to the recommendations of a sub-committee appointed by themselves. But what shall we say of a Trustee who allows a sub-committee to be appointed, and probably votes for it, consents to his candidature for a vacancy on that sub-committee, and more than a month afterwards turns round and for the first time suggests drastic changes in the principles underlying the formation of that sub-committee, and endeavours to set up a string of conditions precedent to his working on it each more staggering than the other? What is wholly unpardonable is that when the Honorary Secretary replied at length to this communication, explaining in a courteous letter how impossible it was for him to alter the decision of the Trustees arrived at in one of their formal meetings, the Nawab Qazilbash did not even condescend to acknowledge his letter, nor even his express telegraphic message requesting him to intimate whether he would participate in the inquiries of the sub-committee on the date which he had himself suggested. A lot of malicious nonsense has been uttered ere this about the irreverence of young Mussalmans towards their elders. Well, we have come across far greater irreverence on the part of the elders towards each other and their seniors, the real patriarchs of the community, and when the official mentors of the "young hotheads" next discourse very solemnly on the duties of the young and the respect and support due to the Honorary Secretary of the College, it is not unlikely that some of the young people preached to would ask if Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Sahib Qazilbash is to be regarded by them as an exemplar in good manners and discipline as well as in the noble art of "offering prayers for his grandfather's soul on the confectioner's shop."

We have given all these unsavoury details because we are afraid that it would not be possible to understand the drift of things without an intimate acquaintance with them. Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Sahib, who is not only a Lahore grandee, but also a considerable landlord in Oudh, had been peregrinating a great deal in the United Provinces in March and April, and, among other places, Allahabad, Lucknow and Rampur were visited by him before his letter to the Honorary Secretary of the College with its staggering suggestions was evolved. If it is true, as the Tribune states, possibly on the authority of the Lahore Nawab himself, that His Honour Sir James Meston's projected visit to Aligarh is in connection with the so-called "Shiah-Sunni complications" of the College, then it is certain that the suggestion of Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Saheb that a non-Moslem Visitor of the College or its Official Patron should preside over the Shiah-Sunni sub-committee, has borne fruit by His Honour's practical acceptance of it in spite of the fact that it has had no chance yet of being considered by the Trustees themselves. Nay, some people may even suspect that the Nawab Saheb's suggestion itself had been inspired.

Now that it is announced in the papers that His Honour Sir James Meston is visiting Aligarh to discuss this question with the Trustees, the thought that is uppermost in one's mind is the one so well expressed in a question by the Poet :

(If the counsellor condescends to visit us, our eyes and hearts must carpet his path. But some one must explain this much: What will he counsel?) His Honour is a staunch Christian and it is not unlikely that he could preside over a Church Conference, organise a Mission or manage a diocese with as much ease as he administers a Province of India. But in the Cawnpore Mosque affair we have painfully realised how little His Honour knows about Moslem divinity, and if the settlement of sectarian difficulties demands an intimate acquaintance with the beliefs of the sects concerned, the intervention of His Honour Sir James Meston will clearly not do.

It may, however, be said that his want of such intimate acquaintance is his chief merit, as that would argue unquestionable impartiality. But we submit that that does not necessarily follow, and even if it did, the question still remains: Have the Mussalmans come to that stage of incapacity to settle their religious differences themselves that a non-Moslem must be brought in to make peace between them? What has happened to suggest that the relations of the Sunnis and the Shi'ahs are so bad that they cannot put their heads together and settle the matter among themselves?

What has really happened has gone to make the path of such settlements far easier than before. Education has always tended to deface sectarian prejudices, and in recent years they were so thin that one could have safely ignored them. When the integrity and independence of Persia were being threatened by England and Russia, Sunnis vied with Shi'ahs in India to save that kingdom of splendid memories. When the Turkish Government was alleged to harbour designs on the treasures of Kerbala and Najaf, even though for providing educational facilities and improving the sanitation of these sacred places, Sunnis were as anxious as the Shi'ahs to dissuade the Turks from touching these treasures without the full and willing consent of Shi'ahs. Similarly, ever since the troubles of the Turks commenced, Shi'ahs vied with Sunnis in protesting against European and Christian aggression and in assisting the war sufferers. Again, when the Cawnpore Mosque affair occurred, Shi'ahs and Sunnis were equally exasperated, and it is significant of the spirit of the times that the names of a Shi'ah Taluqdar and a Sunni Alim were chiefly associated with the Moslem agitation against the high-handedness and cruelty exhibited by the officials at Cawnpore. Nor was it a meaningless co-incidence that of the two Mussalmans that went to England as Moslem delegates, one was a Shi'ah and the other a Sunni. The same solidarity of Mussalmans has been evident in the way in which Sunnis have in recent years proved their confidence in such leaders of Moslem opinion as H. H. the Aga Khan, the Hon. Sir Ali Durrani, the Hon. Justice Hasan Inan, the Hon. the Raja Saheb of Mahmudabad, Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk Bilgrami, the Right Hon. Syed Ameer Ali, Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami and Mr. Syed Wazir Hasan, all of whom are Shi'ah gentlemen. It is no exaggeration to say that at no time have the relations of Sunnis and Shi'ahs in India been more truly Islamic, and therefore brotherly, than they are to-day. And yet what has never once happened in the course of the last forty years, during which Aligarh has been the one hope of Islamic solidarity, is, if we can believe the report in the papers, now going to happen, and the non-Moslem Patron of the College deems it necessary to act as the deus ex machina and settle sectarian disputes at Aligarh. Leaving aside the questions whether His Honour has the authority to interfere, and the ability to assist the Mussalmans out of whatever sectarian difficulty that may exist, we say, and we say it as emphatically as we know how, that His Honour's action would have all the appearance of a gross and an undeserved insult not only to the Trustees of the College but to the Moslem community itself. If the Mussalmans are really incapable of settling such questions without official meddling, then the time has come, not for Sir James Meston to recommend the closing of Aligarh for a year, but for the Mussalmans to close it for ever. The College gates must be shut and the following legend should be inscribed thereon as the epitaph of a thousand aspirations and dreams.

We have no desire to prejudge the demands of a class of Shi'ah gentlemen who still control the Shi'ah Conference, but we trust we shall be permitted to mention just a few to enable our readers to judge what it is that has merited so much official attention. When Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, optimist of optimists, had felt compelled to capitulate to the demands of the present and construct at his College two mosques, one for the Shi'ahs and another for the Sunnis, it was his Shi'ah friend and co-adjutor, Khalifa Mohamed Hasan, who demanded his surrender to the deserts of the past and the claims of the future. Islam was one and indivisible as the Prophet of Islam had preached it, and those who shared one Allah, one Prophet, one Ka'ba and one Quran could not think of two Mosques, one for Shi'ah and another for Sunni worship. This is not a grandmothers' tale of the 'splendid past' of the Mussalmans, but a living tradition at Aligarh, and howsoever keenly the Shi'ah and Sunni students may believe in their own interpretation of those minor points which have evolved two sectarian labels, not one of them to our knowledge has desired to see at Aligarh a separation that does not exist at the Ka'ba and that did not exist when Syed Ahmad Khan and Khalifa Mohamed Hasan built up the mosque of the College. We do not minimise the difficulties of such unity, but we stand on the firm ground of past achievement. We now ask those who have so often differed from the views of their co-religionists in order to please their official patrons, where is now their boasted adherence to the principles and policy of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan? And we appeal to their community to demand from its Shudis, Shaikh Abdullahs and Abdur Raufs whether they still pretend to follow Sir Syed Ahmad Khan. Let each of them now explain his position.

A mere recital of a few more demands would, we think, suffice. Four of them run as follows:—

"(1) The office-bearers and managers of the College and all its departments, whether honorary or paid, should be taken from the two sects in equal proportions, and such offices as can be held only by a single individual should be filled alternately by Shi'ahs and Sunnis.

"(2) Shi'ahs should fill as many seats on the Board of Trustees as Sunnis.

"(3) Salaries and other emoluments (of Shi'ahs) should be equal to those of Sunnis) and Shi'ah employes should receive proportional increments (or promotions).

"(4) In scholarships (or waqifas) Shi'ahs should receive an equality in every way."

Whether these demands are just or unjust we shall leave the sub-committee to decide. But the drift of the demands is obvious and our readers will judge for themselves what effect the unsolicited intervention of Sir James Meston is likely to have on the discussion of such demands among the Trustees.

Chapter XII of the Rules and Regulations of the College consists of the powers of the Local Government and the Director of Public Instruction, and after clearly specifying these powers concludes with Rule 147 which runs as follows:—

The Government and Director of Public Instruction shall have no power to interfere in the internal management of the Education, and the Boarding House and the appointment, dismissal, and transfer of the College staff except as provided in Rule 144, and the matters connected with religious instruction.

This ought to be plain enough, and we do not see how the Local Government can justify any interference in such intimate concerns of the Mussalmans as sectarian differences. But perhaps Sir James Meston is availing himself of Rule 41 according to which "the Patron of the College (the Local Government) may inquire into every matter relating to the College and give such advice to the Trustees as he may deem fit about the improvement, management and welfare of the College." But he could not have ignored the conclusion of that Rule which lays down that "it shall be the duty of the Trustees to take such advice into consideration, and either act upon it or record their reasons for abstaining from so doing." We remember only two occasions in a quarter of a century on which such advice was offered by the Patron. On the first occasion the "elders" were quarrelling in an unseemly manner about office, and Sir James La Touche had no difficulty in persuading the late Nawab Mobsin-ul-Mulk to be re-elected. That was early in 1902. Seven years later Sir John Hewett "advised" the Trustees to retain Mr. Archbold as Principal after he had sent in his resignation, not to his employers, but to the Lieutenant-Governor, on the suggestion, as we believe, he explained later on, of the Chief Secretary to Government. Well, the Trustees had a strong man at the helm and they were not inclined "to act upon it", but were willing enough to "record their reasons for abstaining from so doing." Sir John Hewett was a shrewd man of business and was unwilling to test his kingly power over the waves of an angry sea. He wisely retired and put a cheerful face on the matter. That precedent is not very encouraging in any case, and as Sir James Meston showed at Lucknow on the 16th of August last, he does not unfortunately possess Sir John Hewett's capacity for putting a cheerful face on such discomfiture.

What Sir James Meston will ask the Trustees to do, and how they will act, we are not in a position to know or state. But we honestly believe that he is not empowered to interfere, that he is not qualified to mediate, and that, in any case, the time for mediation has not yet come. The matter has not been considered by the Trustees as yet, and even their sub-committee has not yet met. When the sub-committee has met, inquired into the matter and reported upon it, and when the Trustees have taken some action upon it, and it has proved of no avail, the deus machina may then make his appearance. At present it will be as premature as some "unrehearsed effects" on the stage. And we are sure that of leisure His Honour has none too much. A famine-stricken Province of half a hundred million souls cannot be considered a light charge for a Lieutenant-Governor without his long expected—we had almost said his long promised—Executive Council. But even if His Honour has some time to spare, the Hindu-Muslim entente must surely be held to be a first charge.

The Allahabad University Results.

The results of the various annual examinations held by the Allahabad University have recently been published, and it seems desirable to estimate their bearing on the general state of education in the United Provinces. One need not too often repeat the truism that the problem of Indian education is of superlative importance to the future of the country. No well-wisher of India can, therefore, remain indifferent to the work and achievements of the various State Universities, which are primarily responsible for the solution of the problem. The Education Department of the Government of India stands for the unity of Government educational policy and one of its functions must obviously be to keep a close watch over the work of the Universities and see that their activities are to some extent co-ordinated and lead to progressive results. However, in the peculiar circumstances of India, the Education Department can not adequately meet the needs of the situation. Its standpoint is inevitably different from that of the people. As a State organ, its activities are naturally mixed up with general administrative and political issues, and its treatment of the educational problem of India is apt to be governed on occasions by considerations that are not purely educational. It is, in view of this, of the utmost importance that the people themselves should keep a watchful eye over the Universities and their work should receive a constant, close and careful study from the Indian Press and public men. In the interests of a rapid and wholesome educational advance it seems necessary to organise public opinion and create in every province a sort of people's educational bureau, which would be in close touch with the people's needs, formulate the people's point of view on current educational questions and, after a thorough study of the ways and means, press for necessary reforms in the objects and methods of work of provincial Universities and provincial Education Departments. Without some such organisations the Universities would remain as indifferent to public requirements as they are to-day. Public criticism to be effective must be searching, intelligent and organised. Casual notices in the Press after the publication of the annual examination results of the Universities and hurried references to the character of question papers, text-books, examiners and so forth, usually prove of little avail. The Universities pay little heed to what a somnolent public is pleased to say after it has been roused to a sense of duty for a brief space by the grim tales of the "slaughter of innocents." They live apart in a world dominated mostly by politicians disguised as educational experts and men possibly having every other qualification except a knowledge of India's educational needs. To hope for reform of the Universities from within is manifestly absurd as long as their constitution remains what it is. Some good, however, may be expected to result from the pressure of enlightened public opinion strongly and ceaselessly exerted from without.

These considerations suggest themselves with the last annual results of the Allahabad University before us. Before analysing their actual significance we would like to give the figures relating to the various examinations held in March, 1914. According to these it would appear that 26 candidates went in for M. Sc. (Previous), out of whom 21 have passed; 9 out of 11 have passed in M. Sc. (Final); 68 out of 140 have passed in M. A. (Previous); and 46 out of 61 in M. A. (Final). The passes in the B. Sc. examination are 68 out of 163, i. e., 41.7 per cent.; in the B. A., 115 out of 246, i. e., 43.8 per cent.; in the F. A., 859 out of 1919, i. e., 44.5 per cent.; and in the Matriculation, 1649 out of 3904, i. e., 42.2 per cent. It would be readily observed that, excepting the results of examinations for the M. A. and M. Sc. degrees, the percentage of passes in every other examination is in no case higher than 44.

Taking these figures as criteria, the general state of secondary and higher education in the United Provinces does not seem to be in any way satisfactory. The proportion of those under instruction in the secondary and higher stages to the general population of the Provinces is disappointingly meagre and calls for serious public attention. We reviewed some two years ago the educational position of the Provinces with reference to the economic and social needs of a community of about 48 millions, and we pointed out the utter inadequacy of the numbers then undergoing a process of organised training in public schools and colleges. The position has not appreciably changed since then. There have been slight increases in the numbers of candidates that have appeared this year in the various examinations, but they are practically negligible, and the problem of the growth of secondary and higher education in the United Provinces remains as serious as ever. The educational efforts in the Provinces fall miserably below the standard required for the daily growing needs of the community. The paltry results of both Government activity and private enterprise are best illustrated by the fact that a community of about 48 millions faced with enormous tasks of social reconstruction and economic development can provide for the intellectual training of only less than 7,000 of its youths, a number represented by the Matriculation, F. A. and B. A. candidates combined. This is a state of things that is creditable neither to Government nor to the educational reformers of the community. We need not set about to analyse the causes, but it is incontestable that the Provincial Government will have to change its existing attitude if matters are to be improved. What is needed chiefly is the provision of greater facilities and therefore of greater expenditure for the growth of provincial education. The educational "expert", who professes a passion for efficiency and invariably seeks to attain it by increasing inspecting staffs and making education generally expensive, is the one obstructive individual who has to be cured of his reactionary theories and illiberal doctrines.

Apart, however, from the fundamental question of the growth of provincial education, the nature of the Allahabad University results has, for several years past, been very disquieting. It is evident from the figures we have given above that, excepting the results of the M. Sc. and M. A. examinations, the percentage of passes is in no case higher than 44. These results have been repeating themselves with astonishing regularity for some years past. It means practically that appreciably less than one-half of the students preparing annually for Matriculation, F. A. and B. A. are fit to receive the hall-mark of the University. The wastage is enormous and frightful and calls for a prompt and searching inquiry. Probably in few other Universities in India and certainly in no other University in the rest of the world such an alarming state of things is known to be going on from year to year. It should not at all be difficult to find out the causes to which such a wastage is mainly due. The question is one that in the interests of the provincial education can not be allowed to wait indefinitely. Obviously, there are three chief factors that make up the question, viz., the standards of the University tests, the standards of the school and collegiate teaching, and the standards mentally set up by individual examiners. Only a definite and systematic inquiry can show which of these factors is responsible for such results. If the school instruction and collegiate teaching are defective, the University should take drastic action and disaffiliate such schools and colleges as do not make efficient provision for teaching up to the various curricula prescribed by the University. If examiners are proved to be erratic in their methods and judgments, steps should be taken to see that they rigidly adhere to the University standards and do not give way to individual freaks. But if the University itself is to blame, if its standards are shifty and its methods capricious and indeterminate, if it has neither traditions to cherish nor fixed educational ideals to popularise, if, indeed, it is a chaotic concern in which nobody is particularly and genuinely interested and which anybody that can successfully manipulate votes and patronage may claim to run, then it were high time for somebody to rise and deprive this cumbersome, aimless and mischievous institution of its powers to play fast and loose with the destinies of the hapless youths in the U. P. schools and colleges. It is really surprising that the University authorities can afford to sit still while this grave evil has continued unabated for years. From their apparent indifference it would seem as if they are not conscious of the existence of the evil itself. We are, of course, familiar with a certain frame of mind of the educational expert, who regards the keeping down of the percentage of successful candidates at University examinations as a wholesome measure of "efficiency." The idea underlying this attitude is somewhat this: "The Indian University products are more or less an administrative evil. The greater their number, the louder will be the clamour for posts in Government service. By keeping down the number, you would mitigate the nuisance of the unemployed and consequently help in thinning the ranks of potential agitators." We would like to know if the logic of some such argument has impressed the University of Allahabad. On no other ground can we understand its superb indifference to the fate of hapless hosts whom it annually succeeds in branding as "failures." Why continue the farce of fixing curricula and courses of instructions and terms of study, when more than half the candidates are seemingly unable to satisfy the University tests? It would be far simpler and much more logical if the respective periods of study in schools and colleges were raised to suit the requirements of the majority of students who annually fail and have to continue their study for one year more if they desire to get the University hall-mark.

Coming to the relative position in education of the major communities in the Provinces as disclosed by the University results, we find the Hindus to claim as usual the higher percentage of successful candidates. According to the figures the percentage of Moslem youths in the total University passes is 9.5 in M. Sc. (Previous); 29.4 in M. A. (Previous); 28.2 in M. A. (Final); 5.8 in B. Sc.; 24.8 in B. A.; 18.2 in F. A.; and 14.9 in Matriculation. No Moslem candidate seems to have appeared for M. Sc. (Final). Excepting the M. Sc., the B. Sc. and the Matriculation results, the percentage of Mussalmans in all other figures seems to be higher than their proportion in the general population. But this apparent excess loses all its significance when we take into account the position and character of the college at Aligarh. The students of this college are drawn from every part of India and the number of such as come from places outside the United Provinces should obviously be eliminated from all estimates relating to the educational position of Mussalmans within the Provinces. When it is remembered that the other provinces of India usually contribute about one-half of the total number of students at Aligarh, and that the Allahabad University figures relating to Mussalmans include mostly Aligarh men the educational backwardness of Mussalmans in the U. P. becomes glaringly manifest. The state of things appears still more disquieting when one studies the figures relating to results in what are known as "modern subjects." It will be seen that the Moslem candidates show the poorest results in the Faculty of Science. It is not due to any accident this year; the records of the past years disclose a dismal tale that has been repeating itself with alarming regularity.

The results of the Aligarh College, while maintaining a fair level in the Arts Faculty, sink to discreditable figures in the Faculty of Science and fall much below the University average. In M. A. (Previous), M. A. (Final), B. A. and F. A. the Aligarh percentage is 60.8, 85.7, 51.1 and 43.3 respectively against the University percentage of 48.5, 75.4, 43.8 and 44.5. In all these examinations the Aligarh results have been satisfactory, though in F. A. the percentage falls a little below that of the University. But the results in M. Sc., B. Sc., and in the School Final examination are such as should furnish food for anxious thought to the authorities of the college. Three students went in for M. Sc. (Previous), out of whom one has passed in Physics, yielding a percentage of 33.3 against 80.7 per cent. of the University. Out of the two unsuccessful candidates one had taken up Physics and the other Mathematics. It appears that no student was prepared this year for M. Sc. (Final). Twelve students appeared at the B. Sc. examination of whom only two have been successful, i. e., 16.6 per cent. against 41.7 per cent. of the University. In M. A. (Previous: Mathematics) two students appeared both of whom have failed, while the solitary candidate that went in for M. A. (Final) in Mathematics and has passed is an Assistant Professor of Mathematics in the college who took his B. A. degree in 1907 and had already made two unsuccessful attempts for his M. A. In the School Final examination only five students have passed out of 30.

The points demanding a searching investigation in relation to these results are various. The School Final results cast an ugly blot on the teaching of the Aligarh School and we trust no effort will be spared to elucidate the causes to which they are due. We understand the Honorary Secretary of the College Trustees has decided to make a thorough inquiry into the matter. The results of his inquiry will be awaited with deep concern by those interested in the progress of the Aligarh School. Whatever the causes, we hope they will be speedily removed and the repetition of this year's scandalous results will be rendered impossible. As regards the Prince of Wales' School of Science and the paltry work that it has been doing, an equally searching inquiry is called for in relation to its organisation and teaching. Its maintenance is costing the Moslem community an enormous amount of money. The actual expenditure on its working in 1913-14 was Rs. 32,348-2-10 and the estimates for the 1914-15 come up to Rs. 35,700-5-4. It has an expensive staff consisting of three senior professors of European qualifications with a considerable number of assistant professors, who are all graduates of the Indian Universities, and large sums are spent annually on the equipment and upkeep of its laboratories. In these circumstances it is really a matter of the utmost urgency to inquire if such a bloated establishment involving huge expenditure has any justification for its existence. In actual fact, two B. Sc.'s represent the annual output of the Prince of Wales' School of Science, for the M. A. in Mathematics was a failure of the two previous years and had therefore no necessity to avail himself of the School's teaching in the course of the last year. It means, then, that upwards of Rs. 32,000 have been spent last year in manufacturing two Bachelors of Science! Could anything be more grotesque? And such results have been the normal feature of the work of the School since its establishment. Clearly a searching inquiry is called for, and we trust the Honorary Secretary of the college, who has already made up his mind in this matter, will ensure a speedy and thorough investigation. The scope of the inquiry should include the quality of the Science teaching and the work of individual professors. It should also extend to an investigation of the causes that keep the undergraduates from joining the M. Sc. and B. Sc. classes in appreciable numbers. We hear that many of this year's failures in B. Sc. intend to take up the Arts course. If some accounts are to be believed, it would appear that boys hesitate to take up Mathematics because Dr. Zia-ud-Din, the senior professor in charge of the subject, is said to be in the habit of paying insufficient attention to class work. It is rumoured that very few lectures are given by him, and to save himself from results such as fell adoption of necessary measures to remind those of the college professors, to whom a sterile and senseless spinning round college "politics" has proved an attractive occupation, that their duties lie in the classroom and their talents would be better employed in looking after the work and progress of the undergraduates than in trying to make a mess of affairs with which they have no concern and which they are scarcely competent to handle. The Prince of Wales' School of Science has got to be reformed. There has been enough waste of money and of the time and energy of students already, and it can not be allowed to go on any longer. We await the result of the inquiry that the Honorary Secretary has initiated and we only trust it will eventually result in a thorough reorganisation of the work and teaching of the School. But this requires a firm hand and resolute heart and the Honorary Secretary will have to be very persistent before he can achieve any results.

A FOOLISH TIRADE AGAINST THE BAR.

A WRITER who signs himself as "Ignotus," a well enough known pen-name in the Reviews, contributes to The Asiatic Review (formerly The Asiatic Quarterly Review) an article bearing the notoriously sensational heading: "The Indian Peril". It is in reality a foolish tirade against the Bar in India based on the secondhand information to be found in M. Joseph Chailley's book translated by Sir William Meyer. The article teems with references to "our critic" and "our author" and with numerous quotations from his book, and the dull monotony of the thing is broken only by the amusing references of equal frequency to "the leading journal" which is none other than the one we knew as "the paper for thinking people" when it catered ponderosity for the English breakfast table at threepence and latterly at twopence a day, and has now come down to the commonplace penny. The writer brings together "all the talents" in order to condemn the Bar, and we particularly note that on July 23rd, 1912, "the leading journal" declared that "the working of the Chartered High Courts of India, and more particularly of the Calcutta High Court, has been a secret nuisance in the Indian administration for more than a century". Our old friend the creator of "the Indian Peril" of last December is also quoted as saying: "The High Courts and Chief Courts have stereotyped a jurisprudence which rests on the strict and literal interpretation of the law. (Pray, what have the Chief Courts done to deserve such censure? Ed. Comrade). In the older provinces this evil is irremediable: legality and formalism have triumphed and the people are resigned." Not content with the evidence of these witnesses, the writer puts some more into the witness-box. Here is Mr. Carstairs, and if you want to be sure that he is wholly disinterested you have only to look at the letters "I. C. S." at the end of his name. He is the author, as also perhaps the denizen, of "The Little World of an Indian District Officer", and his testimony is as follows:—"A most discouraging feature is our singular want of success in getting anyone punished for the crime of dacoity. We had a judge prone to acquit. If I remember rightly, he acquitted in every case sent up except one, and in the one case where he convicted the accused were let off on appeal to the High Court..... When we saw the reasons for acquittal, it did seem as if no mortal evidence would have satisfied the High Courts." After Mr. Carstairs, I. C. S., Sir Bamfylde Fuller, K. C. S. I., C. I. E., steps in and repeats the evidence he gave on the 7th October last before the "thinking people" who read the "leading journal" that "the authority of the Indian Civil Service has been partly undermined by the Calcutta High Court," as if it meant the same thing as the authority of the King having been undermined. Even Mr. Fielding Hall has been sub-penned to swear the irrelevant statement that "the Courts are but collecting agencies for money-lenders; the people despise them", as if the Judiciary as well as the Executive had usurped legislative functions and created the bunya's arcadia. Wonder of wonders, even Sir Henry Cotton is dragged in to support the claims of the I. C. S. that law and procedure, rules and regulations, precedents and rulings are all forms for which fools alone contest, that whatever they administer is administered best, and that the good old rule which said: "Whatever pleases the Prince has the force of law", with a short Amending Bill originating in the Home Department, declaring that the Civilian magistrate and judge are "Princes" within the meaning of the Act, would set everything right. The comments of "Ignotus" on "the testimony of all these unimpeachable witnesses"—Sir Henry Cotton and Sir Bamfylde Fuller both on the side of and among the angels!—are worthy of perusal. "Can we wonder," he asks, "at the increase of lawlessness and the powerlessness of police and magistrates under a system where the Bench (one in training, sentiment and sympathy with the Bar, its progenitor) orders acquittals wholesale if Western chicane and Oriental astuteness can find a flaw in the indictment, an oversight in the procedure, or a contradiction in a witness's evidence? The Indian Peril proceeds from a régime of sophists..... These defects are, briefly,

"condemned by practical experience..... Symptoms are not wanting that a strong movement is being engineered with the cry, "Complete Separation of Judicial from Executive Functions." This slogan has just that appearance of consistency which masks its real purpose. That purpose is to throw the blame of the present discontent on the alleged defective knowledge of those occupants of the Bench who are not under the sign of the Inns of Court."

A SUBJECT FIT FOR MOLIERE.

Well, we only wish Indian Courts had half the disease that "Ignorance" has attributed them. But that's another story. Our purpose here is to invite the attention of those who write like this to a recently reported case from that worst of Courts, the High Court of Calcutta—and may it long remain as bad, though we pray there may not be any 'better' or 'worse' in our law courts in future. Such writings of which no Local Government takes the least notice under the Press Act for "bringing the administration of justice into contempt" in spite of their grossly libellous character, though Judge Mackarness's Pamphlet on the methods of the Police has long been declared forfeited, are clearly bits of special pleading for a type of Civilian unfortunately only too common in Northern India to whose love of Justinian's dictum we have alluded. Need we wonder then that Calcutta found unusual attraction in the proceedings of a case in which a Northern India District Magistrate belonging to the Primer Service gave evidence before the Bar-trained Bench of the Calcutta High Court and was cross-examined by that "humble Barrister," Mr. Eardley Norton? No wonder the papers bore the headline "Civilian Witness" in bold letters, for was not the subject fit for Molière?

THE CAMEL AT THE FOOT OF THE HILL.

The Civilian surrounded by the halo of prestige is one of the great planets of the bright official firmament of the U. P. when he sits in a costume generally associated with polo to mete and dole unequal laws unto a savage race of black bipeds clustering round the Collector's Cutcherry. As the Press Act does not apply to words which are likely or have a tendency, in all possible and impossible ways, to bring into contempt anyone so insignificant in these days as God, we have no hesitation in repeating the blasphemy of the editor of the Zamindar who wrote:—

میں تو اللہ تعالیٰ کو کثیر سمجھا

(Others may describe His omnipotence as they please;
I regarded God Almighty to be a Collector.)

But the U. P. Civilian is not in his proper setting in the Calcutta High Court. He certainly shows to no better advantage than Sir Ali Baha's Political Agent beyond Aden. He is something even less luminant than the A. D. C.-in-waiting when he has doffed his scarlet uniform and donned Mufti. He doesn't even bear the marks of earlier refulgence which are noticeable on the charred stump of a rocket. How have the mighty fallen indeed. The nearest approach to him is the proverbial Camel when he gets to the foot of a Mountain and receives the first shock in connection with his unsurpassable altitude the thought of which had contributed so greatly to the development of a nonchalance and mighty disdain no less noticeable than his hump.

THE MEANEST OF MORTALS.

These stray reflections are merely by the way and have no application to Mr. A. F. Fremantle, Deputy Commissioner of Barabanki during this hot weather as he was of Unao during the last. As everybody knows, Rajputana Politicals and Oudh Civilians are the meekest of mortals, and wear their great powers, whether conferred by British Indian law or Native State and Taluqdari usage, generally with the same ease and absence of display as a Copper or Oil King's consort wears her diamonds. With this preliminary explanation let us begin. At the Calcutta High Court before Mr. Justice Chandhuri, Mr. A. F. Fremantle was examined de bene esse on behalf of the defendant in the suit brought by Babu Russick Lall Mullick, an attorney of the High Court, against Pandit Jay Kishen Tewari to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. The defence was that the defendant did not prosecute Babu Russick Lall Mullick but that the prosecution was instituted by the Magistrate upon certain information. The report says:—

Mr. Allan Frederick Fremantle examined by Mr. Sircar, counsel for defence, said: I am a member of the Indian Civil Service. I have been so about thirteen and a half years. I am at present Deputy Commissioner of Barabanki. I was Deputy Commissioner of Unao from 19th March to 1st October last year. I know the defendant. I think he called upon me in May 1913, at my house. My impression is he came generally to call on me as Deputy Commissioner and also to complain about some people in his village. In May 1913 when he saw me he made no complaint against Russick Lall Mullick.

Did he at any time ask you to issue any process against Russick Lall Mullick?—No.

Neither verbally nor in writing?—No.

Continuing Mr. Fremantle said: I issued a warrant against Russick Lall Mullick.

Did you issue that warrant on your initiative?—Yes, entirely.

Mr. Ghatak, counsel, appeared before you at Unao for Russick Lall Mullick?—Yes.

Mr. Fremantle next said: When the case came on before me I suggested I should transfer the case as I presumed the accused wished to avail himself of his rights under Section 191 of the Criminal Procedure Code, clause (c). The case was not actually transferred for the reasons stated in my order. Ultimately the accused was discharged.

Had Pandit Jay Kishen Tewari beyond being a witness for the prosecution anything to do with the prosecution of the accused?—None whatever.

"PROMOTION IS SO BAD!"

After this the cross-examination began, and we note that Mr. A. F. Fremantle was quite bright and almost gay when Mr. Norton opened it.

Witness said he had been a Magistrate since he came out to India, thirteen and a half years ago.

And how long a District Magistrate?—Recently. I have generally been reverting in the cold weather. Promotion is so bad (laughter).

Thirteen and half years out in India and not yet a pukka Collector? Promotion must be bad, for does not four or five years' service often entitle a Civilian—an English Civilian—to officiate in the rank of the Almighty Collector of a district in the U. P. with a million souls, including both dotards and "hotheads"? Let us proceed.

May I take it that in the course of your experience as a District Magistrate you are familiar with the Criminal Procedure Code and its various provisions in regard to the taking of cognisance?—Yes.

Have you thought carefully over the facts of this case in so far as your action in it is concerned?—Yes.

Do you think you made any mistake in law in your proceedings?—I think I had very good grounds for issuing the warrant.

That is not my point. I am asking you whether you consider in the course of your proceedings you have at any time been guilty, so far as you recollect, of any contravention of the Code?—No.

"RATHER BAD GRAMMAR."

So far so good. A clean conscience is a valuable asset, though a bad memory is often a serviceable substitute. We have after this declaration a compensating confession touching in its candour, the admission of a combination of good law and bad grammar.

Had you known the defendant in this case Pandit Jay Kishen Tewari for some time personally?—No.

Had you known him before he came to you with a letter in December 1912?—He came to me in May 1913.

I will tell you why I put that question. In his statement to yourself the present defendant has made this statement: "I received a letter—"

Mr. Fremantle (interrupting): I know what the difficulty is. If you read that sentence out, I will explain it. It is rather bad grammar on my part (laughter).

Mr. Norton: I have not come to the bad grammar as yet (renewed laughter).

"FATHER OF A FAMILY."

Indeed we are shocked at Mr. Norton's want of appreciation of such witty confessions. But perhaps he may improve later on.

Do I understand you were not personally acquainted with the defendant at the time he gave you the letter?—No.

Is it not a fact that this man brought you a letter purporting to be written by the plaintiff?—He gave me a letter.

When?—In May 1913.

Where was that given to you?—In my office in my bungalow.

At your private residence?—Yes.

Had you known the defendant before that date?—No I had not seen him. I knew nothing about his antecedents. I don't think I made any enquiries about his antecedents. He spoke to me in Hindustani, I understand Hindustani.

In handing you the letter did he do so voluntarily or at your request?—Voluntarily. As far as I remember he said there was some person or persons in his village who were harassing him and as an example of the harassment he received he showed me this letter.

He came to you as a sort of father of a family (laughter)?—Yes.

Not as District Magistrate?—The same thing.

Are all District Magistrates fathers of families (laughter)?—The people of the district generally call them their "ma bap." I don't know what they mean. They know what they mean.

A QUESTION OF IDENTITY.

This is really very interesting. Mr. Fremantle is "father of a family" without knowing the reason why. We wonder whether he is the same gentleman who, in the exercise of his rights as a somewhat precocious "father of a family" entered the Zenana of an aged zamindar in the district of Pilibhit, where he was doing settlement work, and dragged him out to his office in the presence of his tenantry, when he had regretfully declined to attend on the ground of indisposition.

THE "HEIGHT" OF THE HIGHER STANDARD.

But we need not tarry over so slight an incident in the midst of another Ma-Bap story. Mr. Fremantle deplored that in a short interview lasting five minutes Pandit Jay Kishen Tewari, whom he did not know before, and into whose antecedents he had not inquired, handed him the attorney's letter, sought his help against those who harassed him and obtained the promise of assistance from this "father of a family." This happened on the 3rd May, 1913. On the 18th June, 1913, Mr. Tewari was examined by Mr. Fremantle. Then the following evidence was given in connection with the examination of Mr. Tewari and the subsequent proceedings. Readers will please note the subtle distinction made by Mr. Fremantle between the Higher Standard and the Higher Proficiency and the complete humiliation of Mr. Norton whose ignorance of Persian contrasted so glaringly with Mr. Fremantle's ability to read Urdu—with assistance.

After that interview between the 3rd May and the 18th June, did you make any record whatever anywhere that you were taking up this case of your own volition—either in the order sheet or any other document?—I think I did not. I was afraid he might get wind of it.

Did you start any order sheet in connection with this case? Until I get the record from Unao I cannot say. It is very difficult to remember.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Is everything in connection with this matter on the record? Whatever you did does everything appear on the record to the best of your recollection?—Yes, except probably a confidential letter I sent to the C. I. D. with respect to getting a copy of a signature.

Except a confidential letter written to the C. I. D. everything else you think is on the record?—I think so.

Mr. Norton: I take it that you read Urdu?—I cannot read it very well without assistance. I may be able to read it. It depends on the script.

Are you in a position to read your own order sheet?—I usually cannot without assistance. I can read this (shown).

I understand you have passed the Higher Proficiency in Persian?—No, only the Higher Standard.

What is the date of the first entry in the order sheet?—The 1st July, 1913.

That is obviously incorrect because you examined this man on the 18th June?—Yes.

Where is the reference in the order sheet to the examination?—I don't know where the first order sheet is. This may be the first.

Will you kindly look. I am ignorant of Persian. There is no order sheet of your examination of Tewari on the 18th June?—No.

TAKEN BY SURPRISE.

Now we come to something more interesting, though one has to wade through some details in order to get to the land of "Surprises".

I have certain certified copies of the proceedings of June 18th here. I want to bring these to your notice. Who puts the entitlement on the papers in your court? Do you do it yourself?—I write it in English.

(Copy of title of case shown "King-Empress, through J. K. Tewari" etc.) May I take it that this charge and this portion of the entitlement are in your handwriting?—No, I will not say that it is in my handwriting.

Is any portion of it in your writing?—I don't think so.

That was written on the paper when you received Tewari's statement?—No, I will not admit that.

Then what do you admit?—I admit that I received his statement. Subsequently when the criminal file was prepared it was made part of the criminal file.

The entitlement is part of the proceedings of the court?—I don't think so. It is not. It might have been done in the Copying Department.

That entitlement was put on. It is not a forgery. It must be part of the proceedings of your Court?—It might have been added in the Copying Department. Supposing you put in an application for a copy of a statement made in the case of the King-Empress &c. so and so, the Copying Department would put on the words "copy of a statement made in the case of" etc.

I think you will admit that part of the official record of the statement which you took in this matter?—That heading?

Yes.—I have just said I don't admit it. It may be so, but I don't think it is.

Have you ever seen this statement with this heading before or have heard it read to you?—It has taken me by surprise.

CIVILIANS AND "OBVIOUSLY BAD ENGLISH".

Well, we are fast coming to the conclusion that Mr. Norton is a bad man. He takes undue advantage of official surprises and even presumes to allude to candid confession about "bad grammar" made in a gay communicative mood. The following will show what we mean:—

What portion surprises you, will you point it out?—The words "in pending." This is obviously bad English and the words "Through Pandit Jay Kishen Tewari" is a pure mistake, because it is suggested that he was the complainant when he was not.

Mr. Norton: I say that Civil Servants are quite capable of writing bad English.

Witness: It is incorrect and the proper designation of the case is King Emperor &c. (Russick Lal Mullick).

This is the first time that this has been brought to your notice?—Yes. I have never seen this paper as far as I recollect it.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Your attention was not drawn to it?—No.

Mr. Norton: If you saw it you did not correct it?—If I saw it I did not correct it.

Are we to take it that since 18th June up to date, bearing in mind the letters you have written to this court, you have never taken the trouble to verify the records in this case?—I have never sent for the records. No I did not.

You are taken by surprise that the entitlement of the proceedings lends colour to the statement that you were taking down the statement of the complainant?—It certainly does lend colour to that.

"HUMILITY DUE TO OUR RESPECTIVE SITUATIONS."

Then we come to some more details about Mr. Fremantle's intentions and the official record thereof or its absence, and some technicalities of law that are evidently as distasteful to some U. P. District Magistrates as to the lay man. But the reader would no doubt mark how humble the mere barrister has to be when pitted against a Civilian Magistrate.

At that date, the 18th June, had you made up your mind to try the case or to transfer it?—To transfer it.

It follows from what you have stated—in the absence of any order sheet—that there is no order sheet which evidences your intention to transfer on the 18th?—No.

Is there any letter of a private character from you to Tewari or anybody else evidencing such an intention on that date?—No, because the law obliged me to transfer if the accused exercised his right of asking for the case to be transferred and I never doubted he would not ask for that right.

That is begging the whole pith of my cross-examination. You have sworn in this Court that on the 18th June you were acting under clause (c) of Section 191 of the Criminal Procedure Code?—I think I said Section 190 clause (c), not Section 191.

Mr. Norton: I am not a Magistrate (laughter). I may be wrong.

Did you on the 18th June intend to act in strict conformity with the Procedure Code?—Yes.

And in fact did you?—As far as I know I did.

Take the statement of the 18th June. From every point of view it is meant as evidence?—Yes.

And you took it?—Yes.

Is that in compliance with the Code? I don't know of any section of the Code which is against it.

Will you allow me with all humility due to our respective situations to call attention to Section 190 (laughter)?—Yes.

That shows you violated Section 191? It appears I did.

I am going to suggest this is inconsistent with your dream that at that time you were acting on information (laughter). My point is that you were acting on a complaint. If you were acting on a complaint what you did was right; if you were acting on information what you did was wrong. I acted on information but I thought it was only fair to the accused that I should not send a warrant for him 700 miles away unless I got some evidence on satisfactory affirmation against him.

That is an amplification of the Code? It is an interpretation of the Code. Will you point out any section which justifies your action? The section which justifies my conduct is, I think, Section 191.

What portion of it justifies your conduct?—The first words "When a Magistrate takes cognizance of an offence."

That is an amplification of that Section?—I would not call it an amplification.

Substitute a better word?—Interpretation.

Do you think that is correct legal interpretation?—I do.

The section says: "When a Magistrate takes cognizance of an offence the accused shall, before any evidence is taken, be informed that he is entitled to a transfer."—Yes.

You did take evidence before you gave information?—Yes. That is a matter for argument. I don't know as much about law as you do, Mr. Norton (laughter).

"THE WAY BUSINESS IS CONDUCTED."

This last confession was not obviously as gay as that one about "bad grammar." It certainly encouraged even an Indian Bar-trained Judge to put some distinctly unpleasant questions to our U. P. District Magistrate. The light it throws upon U. P.'s fear of "Ye Manne of Law" will no doubt gladden the hearts of the humble Vakils who never appear before a Civilian Magistrate except in the condition of a jelly, a shaking mass of sweetness.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: When you thought it would be fair to the accused to have the informant's statement on oath why did you not ask him to put in a complaint? It would have thrown the burden upon him and not upon you. I thought he would be afraid.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Oh Mr. Fremantle! Is that the way business is conducted? A man comes into Court and gives evidence in open Court on oath making charges against one. Do you think a man who does that is afraid to put in a petition of complaint?—A great many people in my part of the country are very much afraid of making complaints.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Why? You did not want to help him to get out of the consequences of the complaint?—No.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: What was present to your mind?—That if any kind of criminal action was to be taken against an attorney of Calcutta I ought to take the full responsibility of it because he would be afraid to do so being only a small Zaminbar.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: But surely you understand the position, don't you, Mr. Fremantle? A man makes a charge against another man; why should he not make that charge upon a petition of complaint before you, and why should you as the Magistrate of the District help him in not making that petition of complaint?—He did not make any charge against Russick Lal Mullick. He merely gave me certain information.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Information on which you were going to issue a warrant?—Yes.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Don't you think that for the protection of other people the information should be on a petition of complaint? Why should he make statements on which you as a Magistrate were going to issue a warrant, and be protected?—Because he did not wish to have Russick Lal Mullick prosecuted.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Did he say so to you?—No. I did not think he desired to make an enemy of any one so influential as an attorney of the High Court, Calcutta.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: But he did not know Russick Lal Mullick. Russick Lal Mullick was only a name to him. It is common knowledge how afraid country people usually are of anybody who has got anything to do with the law.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: That is no reason why they should be encouraged in that feeling?—It exists.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: I know it exists, but your duty is to remove that misapprehension from the minds of these people. If they come to a criminal Court they ought to do so with a full knowledge of the responsibility that their action entails.

A FRIENDLY SUMMONS.

After this we get an interesting glimpse into the procedure of Mr. Fremantle when summoning a person to his court of which we shall see something more anon.

Mr. Norton (to witness) How did you get this man Tewari up before you on the 18th?—I think I issued a summons, but I am not quite certain.

Will the record show it? You said the order sheet does not?—I cannot remember.

I want to know how he came before you on that day to be examined as a witness. Did you send for him officially or as a friend or how? Did you issue a summons or did you write him a private letter?—I cannot remember.

You would not be averse to writing him a private letter? I would not be averse.

In fact in this case you have written private letters to Tewari in connection with this matter? Certainly, I have.

So that in the absence of any record you may have summoned him by private letter? It may be.

AN UNCKAING CURRENT.

Then we come to the entitlement of another order. Witness was shown his own order sheet and Mr. Norton asked if the entitlement of the order which read "King-Emperor through Pundit Jay Kishen Tewari" was in his handwriting. He replied in the negative and said that though he read it he did not alter it. It was a mistake. Then comes the entitlement of a summons. Witness then admitted to Mr. Norton that the summons contained the statement "Babu Jay Kishen, complainant." He admitted that this statement surprised him.

Did you experience any sensation of surprise at the time when you read it?—I don't read summonses when I sign them.

Why I lay special stress upon that is that you yourself have admitted that an incriminatory suit against an attorney living 700 miles away required a certain amount of prudence and care?—Yes.

Did you exhibit that prudence and care?—Yes.

Did you sign that summons before you signed it?—No.

To whom do you attribute that unceasing current of the word "complainant"? The Peshkar thought that he must be put in as complainant.

CO-OPERATION.

We have already had a glimpse into Mr. Fremantle's procedure in summoning witnesses. Now we have the full view of the Ma-Bap procedure in the management of evidence. By the way, may we ask Mr. Fremantle what exactly is the vernacular form of address of which "My dear"—was a very free translation, but of which the "Commander of my Kindness and Favour" was the "nearest approach" in English? Anyhow, lucky Jay Kishen Tewari, to be the commander of so exalted a personaged kindness and favour.

On the same date you wrote a private letter to Tewari? It was written in Urdu by my Peshkar. What one would call demi-official. I don't admit it is private because it is written by my Peshkar or the other clerk of my Court. It was dictated by me in open Court.

It begins "My dear Jay Kishen Tewari"? That is a very free translation.

What is the translation? "Commander of my Kindness and Favour." It is very difficult to put it into good English.

You are suggesting to this gentleman that he should turn up with his witnesses to prove his alibi?—Yes.

You assure us that you did not see this gentleman between the 18th June and 4th July? I don't think I saw him between those dates.

On the 18th June all that you elicited on oath from this man was upon the question of alibi. Where did you get the facts upon which you made the suggestion that he had three or four witnesses to prove that fact? I thought that he would have some people of his household or some persons from the village to speak.

I am on the number. Who told you that he had three or four witnesses to prove his alibi?—Nobody.

Did you suggest to him that he should get three or four witnesses?—Yes.

Without knowing whether they were truthful or not?—I did not wish him to produce untruthful witnesses.

What made you suggest that definite number? That is not definite.

What do you mean? I mean a few.

How many?—I cannot say. I don't necessarily mean three or four.

On what information did you base that number?—I thought three would be sufficient to prove an alibi.

Why did you suggest three?—All these subtle considerations did not enter into my mind.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Leaving aside the number, why did you suggest at all that he should bring witnesses?—Because I thought his evidence alone was not sufficient to prove an alibi.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: On the 18th when you examined him why did you not get from him the witnesses?—I forgot it.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: It is a curious lapse of memory on the part of a District Officer. You examined a person on oath and I want to know from you as to why on that date you did not ask him to name his witnesses?—It was a lapse of memory. At the time I took his statement I should have asked him what witnesses he could have brought.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: I think you will agree with me that it was not proper to write demi-officially or otherwise to a person of that character asking him to bring witnesses?—I must defer to your judgment.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: I ask your opinion?—You have already given your opinion and I don't like to give any other opinion contrary to your Lordship.

MORE SURPRISES!

This respectful deference to the Judge's opinion was truly touching. It suits well for Barabanki. But that's another story. Mr. Norton, it seems, unearthed some more of the braud "Emperor through Jay Kishen Tewari", and asked:—

Did you write the whole of this entitlement (document shown)?—I am certain I did not read this entitlement.

This is your fourth surprise?—Yes. I don't think I read that. I am certain I never put it down all this.

You have a double surprise in the other paragraph?—Yes.

I put it to you that you are acting under a complete delusion in this case, and I will tell you what I suggest to you, that in fact you did act on a complaint given to you by Tewari?—I certainly did not. If it was so I would have told him to put it on stamped paper.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: He did make a verbal complaint to you?—No complaint against Russick Lal Mullick. He complained against persons in his village.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: And he wanted you to take action upon that complaint?—Yes.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: And it was upon that you took whatever action you thought fit?—It was certainly in consequence of information received from the present defendant.

EXPLANATIONS AND THEIR VALUE.

With reference to Mr. Fremantle's examination of Russick Lal Mullick, the attorney whom he had called to his Court under a warrant as the accused all the way from Calcutta and then discharged, we have the following interesting dialogue:—

The witness said he examined the accused under Section 361 Cr. P. Code.

Mr. Norton: Will you just look at Section 361. It is merely adjective. 312 is the section which entitles a Magistrate to examine an accused person for the purpose of enabling him to explain away any circumstances that may appear to be against him?—Yes.

You examined this man under Section 361 and you are a Magistrate of considerable experience on your own showing. You claim that you did not consciously violate the law. I have shown one instance where, argumentatively you have under Section 190, clause (c). Under what right did you examine this man unless you were trying him?—The proceedings were rather irregular, for this reason that I was going to take the ordinary course of transferring the case to another. Then Mr. Ghatak put in an application and said that he did not want it transferred because there was no case. I thought before I would grant the application or not that it would be quite fitting to examine the accused and take his statement.

I want to know under what authority you did it?—I was trying the case until I actually passed an order transferring it.

If you made up your mind to transfer the case how did you examine the man?—Mr. Ghatak made me change my mind.

He cannot make you violate the law. He is only a humble barrister?—The accused can waive that right.

I want you to explain to his Lordship what inherent right you had under the Code to examine this man if you were only going to transfer the case? It was my intention at the time to transfer the case when the accused put in an application, and when he would not do what I expected him to do a new situation arose.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: You need not labour the point.

Mr. Norton: I am giving him a chance of explaining.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: His explanations are worth nothing.

MOST UNFAIR!

Promotion is indeed very bad in the U. P. But it seems presumption is equally great. It begins rather early as we shall see. Here's a brush with counsel on the subject of comparative veracity.

Mr. Norton: I want you to recall a little occurrence in your Court on the day you discharged the accused. Is it not a fact that the Court Inspector or the Sub-Inspector was present that day?—Yes, he was the Court or Assistant Court Inspector.

And Tewari was there?—Yes.

And did not the Inspector inform Mr. Ghatak and my client that Tewari wanted to put some questions?—That I certainly cannot remember.

And don't you remember that you yourself turned round and said: "You have got me into this mess."—Said to whom?

Either to Tewari or the Court Inspector in the presence of my client and his counsel?—I certainly cannot remember saying anything of the kind. Of course if Mr. Ghatak chooses to go into the box—

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: Don't say that.

Witness: It is unfair to cross-examine me on that if the gentleman won't go into the box.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri: How do you know he will not go into the box? You are not competent to say so.

A "SALUTARY LESSON."

After this comes the admission about presuming to teach a "salutary lesson" to an attorney.

Later on you wrote a letter to my client, dated the 6th January, this year?

—Yes.

That was in consequence of a conversation between Tewari and yourself?

—Yes.

He also came to you and asked you to extricate him from this civil suit?

—Yes.

You wrote to my client and stated that he brought himself within the ambit of the criminal law in instituting this suit?—I said that because I thought he understood perfectly that I was completely responsible for the unlawful arrest and malicious prosecution of which he complained.

You have gone further in your letter and you say that the proceedings against him before you were a salutary lesson?—Yes.

Yes, promotion is dreadfully bad in the U. P. But what about a pension?

AN UNINFORMING TELEGRAM.

We had been informed that the Karachi Film Case would come up before the Magistrate on the 15th June and awaited the result of his inquiry; but in spite of our telegraphing for the result to Our Own Correspondent at Karachi we learnt nothing before the following telegram appeared in the papers of the 27th instant:—

"Karachi, June 25.

"In the case in which a cinematograph proprietor is charged with 'outraging Mahomedan feeling by exhibiting a film imputing gross 'immorality to the Prophet Mahomed, the Magistrate after a prolonged 'hearing and inspection of the film, gave the complainant an opportunity to withdraw the charge, but he refused. The Magistrate then 'dismissed the case.

"The Sind Gazette states that the film had no relation to the Prophet, but represented the French idea of modern life in Morocco. 'The film has not been exhibited again."

This telegram was most unsatisfactory, as we could not understand on what grounds the Magistrate had dismissed the case. In view of the clear statement made by the complainant, Mr. Mohamed Hashim, before the Magistrate it was difficult to believe the Sind Gazette's interpretation, nor was there any indication that the Magistrate believed that interpretation either.

THE "SIND GAZETTE'S" APOLOGIA.

But the Sind Gazette of the 25th instant had also arrived by the same post and it contained the following apologia:—

"The City Magistrate of Karachi has dismissed the charge 'brought by some Muhammadan gentlemen against Mr. Greenfield, 'the managing proprietor of the Karachi Picture Palace, in connection with the exhibition of the film entitled 'Azim.' The 'decision, if we may so say, is characterised by that 'solid good sense and strong love of fair play which are discernible 'in all Mr. Richardson's judicial pronouncements. Had this film 'been a blasphemous distortion of Muhammadan sacred history and 'had Mr. Greenfield exhibited it in a Muhammadan city in order 'either to wound Muhammadan feeling or to lower the veneration 'in which the great Prophet of Mecca is deservedly held in the 'world by a hundred million people, we should not easily find 'words to reprobate his malevolence. Even if the film had cunningly preserved historical accuracy while maliciously singling out 'for representation an episode least favourable to the reputation of 'Islam's founder, we should still condemn it as a gratuitous outrage. Whatever the attitude of Christianity may be towards the 'other great religions systems of the world, and particularly towards 'the splendid monotheistic religions, it is certainly not an 'attitude of insult and contumely. But in this case, on the 'contrary, both the elements of guilt were utterly wanting. There 'was no affront and there was no intention to affront. As 'to the first point the film was wholly unrelated to Koranic themes. 'The wonder is that Muhammadans should not have been the first to 'recognise this. Everybody, even among non-Muhammadans, is 'aware that Muhammad when his mighty task was done died a 'natural death under conditions of majestic dignity. This film 'represents the central figure as being slain like a dog by the 'avenging husband of the love-persecuted lady. In numerous other 'respects the disparity of events and of conditions similarly removes 'the film from suspicion of anti-Meccan sacrilege. A very learned 'and cultured Muhammadan gentleman, Mir Ayub Khan, declared 'in the Sind Gazette that the film appeared to him to portray a 'French fancy of modern life in Morocco. Let us say at once, 'before quitting this part of the subject, that we do not at 'all regard the film as blameless, though on quite other grounds. 'If the identical film were transformed and produced in a purely English guise at a picture palace in England it would surely be held to 'offend against English canons of good taste. And if this supposed 'Anglicised film were to be produced in an Indian managed picture 'palace in an Indian city it would probably be suspected by many 'Englishmen to imply motives of racial friendliness. But that "carries us to a very wide field of thought, and space will not allow us 'to involve ourselves in a general discussion of the character and influence of cinematograph exhibitions at large. The second point in the 'case immediately before us has to do with intention. The learned magistrate was very positive in deciding that there had been no offensive 'or hurtful intent; and indeed, when we reflect that Mr. Greenfield 'is professedly here not to propagate views but solely to make money, 'we can see how incredible it is that at a time when his Palace is enjoying considerable Mohamedan patronage he would go out of his way to 'import a film that must drive every Mohamedan away from him for 'ever. What happens, we take it, is that the Karachi Picture Palace, 'like other Picture Palaces, subscribes to a universal syndicate of film-providers, who circulate films like a circulating-library circulates books, 'so that Mr. Greenfield usually has no knowledge of what is coming 'to him until it has arrived, and what he receives from a picture palace 'in Bombay he passes on to a picture palace in Lahore. As a fact the 'learned magistrate commended Mr. Greenfield for the tact and good 'feeling shown by him all through this case. To conclude, we think 'that even the hot headed Muhammedans of Ahmedabad, who lately 'demanded Mr. Greenfield's head on a charger, when they come to 'reflect in cooler moments over what has happened, will agree that 'this has been a case of "much ado about nothing".

THE NEVER FAILING MOSLEM WITNESS.

This long apologia also failed to enlighten us and the characteristic fashion in which this Anglo-Indian lullaby was sung roused our suspicions. This is not the place nor the time to discuss "the attitude of Christianity towards the other great religious systems of the world, and particularly towards the splendid monotheistic religions," nor need we join issue at present with our Anglo-Indian contemporary when it states that "it is certainly not an attitude of insult and contumely." This can wait for another occasion, and it is a source of grim satisfaction to a Mussalman that the evidence of Christianity's attitude towards his "splendid monotheistic religion," including the attitude of the Press of Christian Europe during the recent Balkan war, cannot be easily destroyed. To return to the Magistrate's judgment, even the Sind Gazette had failed to throw light on the question whether the Magistrate held the film to be free from all objection from the Moslem's religious point of view. All that it had done was to clutch at the alleged end of Salika's would-be seducer and to show that it did not tally with the historical facts about the passing away of the Prophet of God, as if anything else tallied in the "romance" of the film with the facts of undoubted history. But this was not the solitary piece of reasoning on which the Sind Gazette relied. The never-failing Moslem witness of Anglo-Indian truth was found in Mir Ayyub Khan Sahab of Las Bela, a Barrister of Karachi. If we remember rightly, this gentleman was a good deal in the public eye of Sindh lately on account of his having freely abused Mr. Syed Wazir Hasan for his "advanced" political views and opposed the apprehended Moslem participation in the Congress at Karachi last December, and then having suddenly changed his convictions and joined the Congress himself. But there was nothing in all this to make any one disbelieve the evidence of Mr. Ayyub Khan Sahab, and we unhesitatingly telegraphed to him as follows:—

"Please send at our cost by press message your honest opinion 'about 'Azim' film exhibited by Greenfield in Karachi Picture 'Palace. Refer Sind Gazette leader of 25th. Do you believe 'film to be French fancy of modern life in Morocco and not portrayal of licentiousness of Holy Prophet alleged by Christian 'critics? If so, please state reasons in detail. Also wire exact 'wording of printed description of 'Azim' film published by Greenfield for attracting visitors that day."

We sent another telegram to our own correspondent, who is a prominent and distinguished citizen of Karachi, noted for his public spirit, asking him "if Karachi Mussalmans now agree with Mir 'Ayyub Khan Sahab and the Magistrate's judgment". We also requested him to state their reasons if they did not agree and to post full copy of the judgment and copies of the depositions in the case.

Late on Saturday night when we were going to the press we received the two telegrams which we reproduce below.

MIR AYYUB KHAN'S REPLY.

Mir Ayyub Khan Sahib's reply was as follows:—

"Karachi, June 27th.

"I saw the film 'Azim' the very first evening it was shown by Mr. Greenfield. More than half the audience was Mohamedan. Many educated men were present, but none objected. I never for a moment believed it was a portrayal of the Holy Prophet Mohamed, and took it for one of the several silly films prepared in France portraying life in Morocco as the French from their own notorious religious and moral standard fancy it. The programme and the description in the papers stated 'Azim: a Dramatic Film.' The word 'prophet' makes the film most hurtful to Moslem feelings. Therefore further exhibition of it in India should be prohibited, specially after the Karachi incident."

OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT'S REPLY.

"Karachi, June 27th.

"The Magistrate held the film to be objectionable but discharged Greenfield for want of deliberate intention. Greenfield admitted that he examined the films before exhibiting them publicly, and the film 'Azim,' he thought, would not be objected to because it had been exhibited in Bombay, Meerut and Calcutta, where no objection was raised. Greenfield expressed regret and undertook not to exhibit the film objected to, and to request the Film Company's Bombay Agents, J. Pearson & Co., to withdraw the film 'Azim' from circulation in India. A public protest meeting is fixed for Sunday evening. The Mussalmans are dissatisfied with the judgment and disagree with Mir Ayyub Khan's views because the film depicted an Arab scene, Arab prophet, harem attendants and slaves, and exhibited a miracle wrought and a war waged by the prophet. Greenfield contended that Mir Ayyub Khan and others had seen the film prior to the case but had not objected. Hence Mir Ayyub's defence that he too thought the film to be objectionable but did not openly object, because he thought the film might mean to represent the French idea of Morocco. Mir Ayyub Khan now holds the film to be objectionable and joins in calling a protest meeting and forming a deputation to wait on the authorities and send representatives to Government praying for the proscription of films under the Press Act. Copies have been applied for but the record is with the District Magistrate and will be sent on receipt."

FURTHER INQUIRIES BY THE "COMRADE".

These telegrams at least showed that the Magistrate did not consider the films unobjectionable; that he discharged Greenfield for want of evidence to prove deliberate intention to wound the religious feelings of the Mussalmans on the part of Greenfield himself; that there was a reference in the films to some "prophet" even though Mir Ayyub Khan Sahib understood the film to be a French fancy of modern life in Morocco; and that the Mussalmans of Karachi disagreed with the Mir Sahib's interpretation and were dissatisfied with the judgment of Mr. Richardson, in spite of the fact that our Anglo-Indian contemporary of Karachi states that "the decision, if we may presume to say so, is characterized by that solid good sense and strong love of fair-play which are discernible in all Mr. Richardson's judicial pronouncements". But it was not clear where the word "prophet" had occurred, whether there was any clear reference to the Prophet of Islam, and whence the complainant, Mr. Mohamed Hashim, had taken the description of the film embodied in his petition of complaint. So we sent another wire to Mir Ayyub Khan Sahib as follows:—

"Many thanks for message. But it is not clear where the word 'prophet' occurs. Does it occur in the body of the film in the course of descriptions indicative of the scenes depicted or in the programme or some of the document for which Greenfield was responsible? The whole matter hinges on this even if it escaped the notice of educated Moslem audience. Whence did Mr. Mohamed Hashim complainant, take the description in his petition in the Magistrate's Court? Was our Prophet referred to by name or otherwise in any document published by Greenfield? Please wire immediately. I am delaying the paper for Sunday purposely."

MIR AYYUB KHAN'S FINAL REPLY.

A similar inquiry was addressed by wire to Our Own Correspondent at Karachi. His reply has not yet been received, but Mir Ayyub Khan's reply makes the thing much clearer, and we think it supplies sufficient data on which to base a prima facie case against those who are responsible for the preparation and exhibition of the film. The reply runs as follows:—

"The word 'prophet' occurs in the body of the film in the course of descriptions indicative of scenes depicted and not in the programme or otherwise, which would make Greenfield responsible. Our Prophet's name was not at all mentioned. Mr. Mohamed Hashim must have taken the description from the film when shown on the screen during the show, because Greenfield never published in any other form whatsoever a description of the film. We are holding a mass meeting to-day requesting Government to stop further exhibition of the film in India and if possible to get it destroyed."

AN APPEAL TO THE DENIZENS OF A UTOPIA.

We think all pretence about the "French fancy" and "modern life of Morocco" must be dropped after the admission that the description of the scenes in the body of the film itself which is there to indicate what is meant to be depicted in the pictures that succeed it contains the word "prophet". We hope we are not imitating the spirit of the Pharisees in thanking the Lord that we are still free from the mental squint which is developed through too much use of the Press Act, with its "directly or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor, implication or otherwise." But we appeal to Sir Michael O'Dwyer, Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, to say whether any of his proscriptions and confiscations have been based on half as clear an evidence as the film supplies to the Mussalmans; and we ask Sir Alfred Kensington, Chief Justice, and Justices Johnston and Rattigan of the Punjab Chief Court to state whether Mr. Bevan Petman's services would have been needed at all to prove to their entire satisfaction that the film referred to the Prophet of Islam, and was not a French fancy of modern life in Morocco, if in a foolish Utopia of our own creation, the Lieutenant-Governor and the Judges and the Government Advocate were all Mussalmans, and a Christian Zafar Ali Khan had added to his list of offences against the public tranquility the exhibition of such a film besides the publication of libels on the fair fame of a Moslem Piccadilly?

CHARITY AT HOME.

We shall however, await further information before dealing with Mr. Richardson's judgment and acclaiming either as a Daniel come to judgment or denouncing him as a prejudiced Magistrate. And if charity begins at home, Mir Ayyub Khan Sahib of the "French fancy" and expert in interpreting "silly films" of "modern life in Morocco" prepared in France according to the "notorious religious and moral standard" of the French has at least as strong claims as Mr. Richardson on our silence for a while.

SHOPKEEPERS AND PROPAGANDISTS.

As for Mister Greenfield, nothing can plead for him more than the fact that he belongs, as the Sind Gazette reminds us, to the category of shopkeepers. The Mussalmans are equally notorious tamash-beens, and it is preposterous to suppose that Mr. Greenfield was not there solely to make money but "to propagate views" at the risk of losing the "considerable Mohamedan patronage" which his picture palace was enjoying. We shall not, therefore, imitate the "hot-headed Mohamedans of Ahmedabad" who are alleged to have demanded Mr. Greenfield's head on a charger. But there is bigger fish in the sea than there is out of it, and our Sind contemporary may take our word for it that our net is going to be widespread. Of course the film won't be exhibited again and our poor dear respectable Press Act may be found accommodating enough by the Local Government to deal with the film "Azim" and declare it forfeited to His Majesty. But the matter can not stop there. We have yet to trace this stream of "wanton scurrillity and offensiveness" to its source and dam it there once for all. We shall, therefore, say to Mr. Greenfield's friends "wait and see!"

P. S.—Our Own Correspondent confirms Mir Ayyub Khan Sahib's statement. The description of the film in the complaint is taken from the film itself, all except the name of the Prophet Mohamed, and it is admitted by Greenfield to be correct. But the word "Prophet" occurs repeatedly in the headings of scenes in the body of the film. Our Correspondent concludes thus: "It is for you to judge Mir Ayyub's views." We think it is for his co-religionists—and for his God!

I WAS walking by the river Seine one evening and as I was waiting for a friend of mine to meet me near the Port Neuf, I began to pass the time by looking into the numerous bookstalls that line the river embankment. The face of one of these second-hand booksellers attracted me. He looked so woe-begone and helpless that I there and then made up my mind to buy something from him. This is what I picked up there for 3 francs. I look upon it as an extremely original though a very pathetic document and I am not ashamed to say that I was much moved when I read it:—

"MY LAST DAY."

"I am sitting by myself in a tiny room on the fifth floor of a miserable house in this town of Paris. It is 10-30 p. m. Why am I here? It is to put an end to my life, not because anything particularly sad has befallen me, but because I am sick of the hypocritical life which we have to lead now-a-days if we wish to pass for civilised beings. I have made up my mind to leave this record of the feelings and the emotions of a man who is on the point of committing suicide. It may be of help to those cold-blooded tyrants who pass under the name of scientists. Well! here I am and I hold my revolver in my right hand. The muzzle has a peculiar attraction for me. It fascinates me. From this little tube will come my release. The little bullet which will pass through it will discover to me the mysteries of the world beyond. I kiss my revolver. The wind outside howls and the snow-flakes fall on my panes with a rhythmic thud. Their colour is the colour of the shroud which will so soon envelope me. The elements sympathise with me. They urge me to become one of them. Oh! for a life without body! How I long to be wafted in the air! Shall I really kill myself? What will my sister do? She will mourn for a few days, then forget me. She has her children to look after. Will I really see my love, my sweet-heart who was killed in the railway accident last year near Lyons? What does it matter though the clock strikes eleven, I raise my revolver to my head. Shall I really kill myself? Am I really sick of my life? What will the grave show me? Will I have the power of seeing things without being seen? How delightful! What will my three friends with whom I dined to-night say when they hear of my suicide? Has my life been sad? No. Am I really sick of life? Yes. Why? I do not know. I only know that no form of existence can be sadder than the one I have now. This is all a dream, the awakening will come through the muzzle of my revolver. I now raise it to my head and shall count ten and then pull it. Good-bye! good-bye! good-bye! One!..."

The next day I again went to the bookseller from whom I had bought the book on the inside of which I had found this writing. I asked him as to how he had come to possess that book. He told me that it was bought together with many others in an auction near the Place Pigalle and that it was the property of a very talented young artist of the name of Gaston Remonet who had committed suicide. The chief events of whose life were as follows:—

His origin was not known, but he was believed to be well connected and well off. He had been in love with a very pretty actress who had been killed in a railway accident. He was very hardworking. One day he was found trying to carry on a conversation with a picture which he himself had painted. The servant who used to look after his studies was surprised at first, but he was promptly told to go out of the room as his presence disturbed his master's meditation. For six months more the artist went on painting one beautiful picture after another and amassed quite a fortune, which he subsequently bequeathed to a fund for the aid of poor artists. He was then found shot in one of the many rooms which he used to rent in different quarters.

I asked the bookseller whether he knew where his grave was situated. He told me that he too had visited it as the writing on the book had made him very curious to see something more connected with the author. The grave was in the Pene Lachaise cemetery. I went there and after very great difficulty found it. The writing on the tomb-stone was:—

The Rikabganj Gurdwara.

THE following Press Communiqué has been sent to us for publication by the Hon. the Chief Commissioner, Delhi:—

As is generally known there has for sometime been a certain amount of agitation in regard to the Gurdwara Rikabganj at Delhi. This Gurdwara which is believed to contain the ashes of the Guru Tegh Bahadur, is situated at a short distance from the site of the proposed Government House and Secretariat in the new Capital.

It is needless to say that there has never been any intention to interfere with the Gurdwara itself, (which Government has refrained from acquiring), or with its free use by worshippers. The small walled enclosure containing the Gurdwara is, however, situated within a much larger enclosure of about seven acres which is surrounded by a high wall. The local authorities felt that it was undesirable to leave in private hands a walled enclosure of this size, in proximity to the chief Government buildings, and in circumstances in which it would be difficult to control the use to which it might be put. The outer enclosure was, therefore, when acquisition proceedings commenced, taken up by Government, and it was intended to remove the enclosure wall and make the Gurdwara the centre of a park or garden. Up to this stage no opposition had been offered, either in Delhi or elsewhere, to the proceedings of the local officers; but when one side of the wall was demolished, protests were made from various Sabhas in the Punjab, and the Chief Khalsa Dewan also interested himself in the matter. With a view to clearing up the position the Chief Commissioner requested the Chief Khalsa Dewan to deal with the matter and that body decided to call a representative meeting of the Sikhs specially to consider the question. The meeting was held at Amritsar on the 3rd May and was largely attended by delegates from local units throughout the Punjab. It decided by a majority to appoint a committee to deal with the improvement of the Gurdwara itself, it being held desirable that the shrine should be made structurally worthy of the important position which it will now occupy. As regards the outer enclosure and its wall, the meeting expressed a preference for leaving them in their present condition, but added that "if for the exigencies of the State Government considered a change in the shape absolutely necessary then, keeping the area of the land equal to what it was originally, its rectangular shape may, in the opinion of the committee, be accepted by which the newly granted plot of land may abut on the two new roads on two sides and the Gurdwara may occupy almost a central position of this new plot; provided that all this change be carried out by the Khalsa Committee of the Gurdwara and Government be pleased to help that body in meeting the expenses of the said change."

There was nothing in these resolutions which was inherently opposed to the objects for which Government had acquired the enclosure. As soon, therefore, as they were received, the Chief Khalsa Dewan was informed that the local authorities would be glad to treat with the Committee which it was prepared to appoint; and that an area equal to that of the outer enclosure would be restored to the Gurdwara subject to the conditions that (i) the boundary of the enclosure would be realigned so as to fit in with the two roads mentioned in the resolution (ii) that no buildings should be erected in this area without the consent of Government; (iii) that any wall or railing erected around this area should be subject to similar approval. The Dewan was further informed that the financial aid necessary to effect this change would be forthcoming.

It will be generally acknowledged that the Chief Khalsa Dewan and the representative meeting of the 3rd May have dealt with the question in an eminently reasonable and responsible manner. The Dewan had to face and will no doubt still have to face some opposition from a band of extremists who advanced the contention that any alteration of the outer enclosure was an act of sacrilege. The contention was untenable, for it was not pretended that the outer enclosure had ever been reserved or utilized for religious purposes. But the prompt acceptance of the resolutions of the meeting of the 3rd May should suffice to remove any further excuse for agitation; and to convince the Sikhs generally that Government had no intention of impairing the dignity of the shrine. On the contrary, the net result will be no small gain to the Gurdwara. The piety of the Sikhs will no doubt see to it that the shrine itself will be embellished in a manner fitting its position; it will stand in the midst of an enclosure bounded by two main roads, instead of in the corner of the present unsightly compound; and the finance of the institution will profit from the fact that Government has agreed to assign to it an area of canal land equal to the agricultural lands purchased for its use by the Jhind Dabtar, which it has now been necessary to acquire for the purposes of the new Capital.

The Feminist Movement in Turkey.

AMONG all the various phases of the modern feminist movement, the awakening of the Mohammedan women in Turkey is perhaps the most remarkable. The true nature of this movement, however, has been but little understood, because only one side of the life of the Turkish woman has been given to the public. In the many books on Turkish life that have been published she has almost invariably appeared as discontented, to be sure, with her lot in life, but as showing this discontent only by making a helpless, futile attempt to evade the custom and the law to which centuries have made her subject, with intrigue and cunning as the only weapons at her command.

It is not thus, however, that progress is made. The successful attempt to effect a change must be positive as well as negative, constructive as well as destructive. The old law and the old custom must be changed, not simply avoided, and this is a necessarily slow and difficult process, requiring infinite tact and courage and perseverance. This aspect of the woman problem in Turkey has not been dealt with to any great extent, and yet this phase of the movement is very alive and active in Turkey to-day. Constant evidence of this is seen in the more liberal Turkish newspapers, where, in addition to special articles on questions affecting woman and her social or economic life, more and more frequent mention is made of the part taken by individual Mohammedan women in the affairs of the city or country. Every week also there appears in Constantinople the Kadınlar Dünyası (Woman's World), now in its first year, edited entirely by Mohammedan women and dedicated to their interests. In this paper very full expression is given to the protests of the Turkish women against what they are more and more looking upon as the injustice of their lot, as well as to their aspirations and ambitions to bring about a change. This paper is the official organ of the Mudafa-a-y-Houkouki Nisvan (Society for the Defence of the Rights of Women). The aims of this society are as follows:—

1. To transform the outdoor costume of Turkish women.
2. To ameliorate the rules of marriage according to the exigencies of common sense.
3. To fortify woman in the home.
4. To render mothers capable of bringing up their children according to the principles of modern pedagogy.
5. To initiate Turkish women into life in society.
6. To encourage women to earn their own living by their own work, and to find them work in order to remedy the present evils.
7. To open women's schools in order to give to young Turkish girls an education suited to the needs of their country; and to improve those schools already existing.

Although among these the first five seem perhaps, at first glance, the more important, and the more immediately urgent, the last two contain the real crux of the whole situation, and show that Turkish women have grasped the essential nature of their problem; because it remains true in Turkey as elsewhere, that in woman's economic independence and in her intellectual training lies the secret of her social position.

This programme laid down by the "Society for the Defence of the Rights of Women" finds strong support also in the attitude of the Government of Turkey towards the education and uplift of women. According to a recent statement from the Minister of Public Instruction the Turkish Government is now constantly endeavouring "to extend and to perfect the instructions given to girls and to fit it to the progress and civilisation of the present century—in fact, to modernise it completely. It is with this aim that it has been decided to establish numerous lycées, normal schools for teachers, and schools for domestic training. The Government is working in every way for the intellectual and moral development of the future wives and mothers of Turkey."

Before the Constitution little attention was paid to the education of girls. Mohammedan girls went to the mosque school until they were about twelve years old; or they could attend the lowest grades of the Government schools, where they learned reading, writing, embroidery, a little arithmetic and the Koran. The daughters of a few well-to-do families were taught at home by foreign governesses, but their instruction consisted chiefly in needlework, music, drawing and painting and French. The new régime is attempting to remodel the school for girls as well as those for boys, and many steps have already been taken to raise the grade of the schools to which girls are admitted. Girls' schools are now therefore in process of reorganisation, and it is impossible to speak with any certainty with regard to their actual grading. In general it may be said that the course offered by the Government for girls includes three years in the İpdiyâye or Kindergarten and Primary grades, and three years in the Rüşdiye or Secondary grades. Outside Constantinople this is all the public education furnished for girls. In Constantinople there are three higher schools, one the "Sultaniye," which furnishes a further course of liberal instruction, the second the "Dar-ul-Muallimat," intended for the training of teachers, and the third the "Senaye," or Professional School for Girls.

The Dar-ul-Muallimat existed in Stamboul under the Hamidian régime. At that time, however, it was characterised by the general inefficiency of the period. It was under the direction of a sleepy old Effendi, who spent his time lying on a divan in his office smoking a narghilé, and drinking coffee; and classes were conducted when it was thought best, always with the attempt not to place too great a strain upon the nervous systems and delicate organisms of youth and beauty. Since the Constitution the school has been thoroughly reorganised, and has been moved to a large and commodious Turkish konak surrounded by a beautiful garden. It is now conducted by a efficient Swiss woman with a Turkish co-principal, under the directorship of a member of the Ministry of Public Instruction.

At first the Government attempted to educate here girls living in Constantinople, and to send them to teach in the schools of the Interior. This plan was found impracticable because of the social restrictions to which Turkish women are subject, since they are, of course, not permitted to associate in any way with men other than those of their own immediate families. It was therefore decided to bring the girls from the provinces and to offer them special inducement in the way of paying for their entire support during their course of study, after which they might teach and live with their families at home. This method has succeeded remarkably well, and there are now one hundred and forty-three students from various parts of the Ottoman Empire including, among other places, Syria, Kurdistan, and until recently Tripoli and Crete. This offer is made not only to Mohammedans but to all Ottomans, and there some are Armenians, Hebrews and Greeks in attendance.

This school is conducted with the most rigid regard for Turkish custom and usage. Owing to the presence of men teachers the pupils are required to remain veiled during all hours of the day. The religious teaching also is very strict, the students being obliged to adhere to the orthodox requirement of ablution and prayer five times daily. On the floor of the prayer rooms rugs are spread in oblique rows, to suit the direction in which Mecca lies. The copies of Koran are kept carefully covered with an embroidered black cloth and the usual inlaid Koran stands are near at hand. The work of seeing that the one hundred and forty-three students rise before daybreak and go through then and four times afterwards, every day, the necessary ablutions before prayer, is an arduous task, and is the exclusive duty of a woman employed especially for this purpose. Moreover, these religious requirement interfere very seriously with the arranging of a satisfactory programme. In earlier days, before the many and complicated demands of modern life arose, there were probably sufficient time and opportunity for ablution and prayer five times daily, whereas under present-day conditions, whether in commercial life or in the schools, it becomes a serious question. The non-Mohammedan Ottomans in the school are not required to attend religious services or teaching.

Besides this training for teachers furnished by the Dar-ul-Muallimat, the Turkish Government is now providing training for girls along other practical lines. There was established last autumn in Stamboul a Professional School for girls under the direction of a Belgian woman. The aim of this school is to give to young girls instruction and education in preparation for the social duties of woman, and to fit them, if necessary, to earn their own living. The great demand for education of this sort is shown by the fact that within two months after registration the numbers in the school had grown to five hundred and seventy, and many were constantly applying that could not be accommodated. A diploma is given to girls who successfully pass the examinations at the end of the three professional years. For the completion of a further year of study a certificate is given enabling them to teach in professional schools.

Up to the present time the greater part of the actual work of organisation of the Government schools has come from other than Turkish sources. It is a hopeful sign that the Turkish Government is now looking forward to training its own women for this purpose. Soon after the Constitution a number of Ottomans (all non-Mohammedans) were sent to Europe to study. Some of these women are now teaching in the Government schools in Turkey. A great step in advance of this, however, is made when the Turkish Government undertakes to train its Mohammedan women on Western models. There are now at the American College for Girls at Constantinople eight students supported by the Government, and these girls are pledged to several years of service in the Government school. The total number of girls being educated by the Turkish Government in schools in Europe and in the American College is now thirty-five. In addition to this, the Government has recently sent several Mohammedan women to Switzerland to study drawing and method of teaching. This indicates that Turkey is in this matter trying to train her own people to help themselves instead of relying as completely as has formerly been the case on outside aid.

The fact that the prejudice against the freedom and education of women is surely, if slowly, breaking down, is shown most conclusively however, is the fact that within a week of the present writing the Dar-ul-Finoun, Imperial University, in Stamboul, has opened its door to women. Within the short time already elapsed fully two hundred women have been in attendance. At present, as a beginning, the character of the work is that of University Extension, and no regular registration is required, but the University plans to arrange a regular programme which all who are enrolled must follow, and to impose a specific entrance requirement. The lectures now offered are in pedagogy, hygiene, domestic economy, science, "the rights of women," and history. The courses are given by the University professors, and by prominent specialists. One of the buildings of the University is devoted to this use in the afternoon.

the classes being put at this time in order to allow women who may be busied with domestic duties in the morning, to attend. Separate classes are, of course, arranged for the women, according to the usage of the country. Promise is made, also, that women shall soon be admitted to courses in the Medical School.

The economic independence of woman through her own efforts is, in its larger aspects, a very recent development in Turkey. Turkish women have always inherited money in their own right, and have theoretically managed their own property. In fact, however, in these matters they have most often been controlled by their male relatives. The great ignorance in which the Turkish girl has hitherto been brought up has usually prevented her from being able to look after her own fortune, or to hold her own against the intrigues and the selfish interests of father, brothers or husband as the case might be. It is, however, an entirely different matter when a woman is able to earn her own living, for in this case her money is obtained by her own efforts, and is hers from the very start. In the humbler walks of life Mohammedan women have for a long time been producers as well as consumers. Midwifery has long been practised by them, and they have been employed in a few poorly paid occupations—notably in the silk and fig and carpet factories. As an economic agent, moreover, the Turkish peasant woman of the Interior who bears a large part of the burden of cultivating the soil is not to be ignored, especially since where she thus contributes as much as does the man to the production of wealth, the freedom that she enjoys is proportionately greater than that of her more idle, and economically less important city sister.

Still more significant, however, is it when woman producers become at the same time capitalists, or join the more skilled employments and the professional ranks, and in Turkey at the present time both of these have been taken. Very recently there has been formed in Smyrna a company of women to open a shop for the sale of local products, and a sewing establishment for young Mohammedan girls. As we have seen also, both the Dar-ul-Moualimat and the Professional School for Girls aim at furnishing the higher training needed for the trades and for the profession of teaching. That Turkish women are ready to take advantage of these opportunities is proved by the fact that they are already found on the staffs of the Government schools and others. A great innovation has been made within recent months in the appointment of a Mohammedan woman as a teacher of gymnastics in the Sultanié, above mentioned.

Teaching has been in Turkey as elsewhere the first profession to be seriously pursued by educated women.

Various other professions, however, would seem to lie open to them in the not far distant future. As writers of prose and poetry some Turkish women are already distinguished themselves. The ground for female lawyers would seem also in a measure to have been prepared, for women have always been allowed to enter the courts as witnesses or to plead their own cases. In the field of nursing and of medicine, Turkish women have shown themselves willing and anxious to play a part, and for this the need in Turkey is especially great. Owing to the seclusion of woman, Turkish women have been in great measure deprived of medical aid, even in extreme cases, and many lives have been sacrificed which might have been saved had female physicians been available.

The lengths to which this tradition against allowing men to see women other than those of their immediate family is sometimes carried is shown in the following story told by one of the prominent physicians of Constantinople to a correspondent of Le Jeune Turc. Having been called to attend a Mohammedan woman, the physician was received by her husband in the drawing-room of the harem, and told that the woman was in bed in the adjoining room, and that the door between would be opened for him to interrogate the patient. On his insisting that to diagnose the case he must examine the woman and feel her pulse, the husband reflected a moment, and then, struck a brilliant idea, suggested quite seriously that his wife should stand behind the door and that the doctor should get the register of her pulse by means of a wire attached to her wrist and passed from one room to the other! This is an exceptional case, of course, but others like it might be cited, and while at the present time most men in the capital probably do allow male physicians to attend the women of their families, the state of things revealed in the above anecdote is probably still very prevalent in the Interior.

It is only very recently that Turkey has awakened to the gravity of this situation, and that any sort of attempt has been made to remedy it. The subject of opening to women the career of medicine is being very eagerly urged at the present time. The daily papers and the periodicals have taken up the question, and are laying bare the backwardness of Turkey in this respect, especially in view of the peculiar social conditions there. Hitherto there has been no regular medical training offered for women in the Ottoman Empire, nor have women trained in foreign medical schools been granted a license to practise medicine in Turkey. A few non-Mohammedan women are now acting as physicians, but without any legal sanction. It is, of course, true that in the promised opening of the medical lectures in the University a very important step will have been taken in this direction, and it is to be hoped that others may speedily follow.

Owing to the circumstances described in the foregoing pages, the care of women has fallen largely to the mercies not always too tender, of ignorant and inexperienced nurses mostly of the servant class, whose work, moreover, has been attended with every sort of superstition. These conditions are being somewhat improved at the present day. The Medical School for Men at Haidar Pasha in Constantinople provides a course in midwifery, at the end of which a permit is granted to practise as a midwife. In both Government and foreign hospitals also women are now taken and trained in a practical way under the superintendence of the practising doctors and nurses, but for this no certificate beyond a private recommendation is given. Of both these opportunities some Mohammedan women are availing themselves.

The need of trained nurses was especially felt during the late Turco-Balkan war. At the beginning of the war no trained Turkish women were available for any of the assistance needed. Among other steps taken to fill the demand, a few classes in first-aid were organised at various hospitals throughout the city, to which women of all nationalities were admitted. Many Turkish girls and women attended them with enthusiasm, and for the first time in the history of the Ottoman Empire, Mohammedan women nursed and took care of their fellow countrymen. It is true that they were not in any sense thoroughly trained for this work, but the love and devotion with which they pursued it reveals the spirit which they would bring to the profession if it were once really opened to them.

The Society of the Red Crescent, under the presidency of Princess Nimet, of which many Mohammedan women are members, and which took a very active part in relief work among the sick and wounded and refugees during the late war, has conceived a plan of offering to women a complete training as nurses. Before the war broke out, the Red Crescent had already established a school at the Kadirga Hospital in Stamboul. This, however, had to be discontinued to allow the rooms to be used for the wounded soldiers. The classes have now been resumed, and the Society proposes to build a hospital to which a school for women nurses shall be attached, and meanwhile to continue the lectures on nursing at the Kadirga Hospital.

We have outlined above a few of the more important phases of the constructive feminist movement in Turkey. Although, as will have been seen, this movement is a very recent one, it has proved already one distinctly to be reckoned with. The growing spirit of independence that has accompanied it, upheld by the increasing ability of woman to support herself and to manage her own affairs, makes it impossible to treat lightly the protests that are the outcome of the growing strength of her position. These protests find expression chiefly against two of the main customs of Islam—that of the veil and that of polygamy.

A loud outcry against the veil is being raised by the women of Constantinople. It is claimed by them that Mohammed did not enjoin the wearing of the veil as a changeless institution of Islam, but that his injunctions on this subject belong to that part of the Koran which can be modified with the changing needs of the times. They hold that the economic and social conditions of the twentieth century make it impossible for millions of human beings to remain entirely outside of the activities of the present day, as is made necessary by the wearing of the veil and the seclusion that it implies. They urge, therefore that the veil "which hangs between them and the world" be removed.

The protest against polygamy is closely allied to that against the veil. It is true that at the present time polygamy is decreasing. Most men cannot afford the luxury of more than one wife, and the opposition of women to the custom has not been without effect. So long, however, as the law and custom of Islam allow polygamy, so long will the evil essentially endure; and the demand that it shall be legally abolished is very strong. The day when either the veil or polygamy is done away with entirely is still far off, but the growing economic and social strength of woman will doubtless appreciably affect the situation. Might we in closing be allowed to hazard the prediction that both polygamy and the veil will disappear in Turkey just in so far as woman possesses the ability and intelligence not only to earn her own living but also to make a reasoned and effective protest against the seclusion to which she has been subjected?—ELLEN DEBORAH ELLIS and FLORENCE PALMER, of the American College for Girls, Constantinople.

The Heart of a Woman.

THE MODERN WOMAN.

"Chitra, the lovely heroine of Tagore's drama, distinctly partakes of the type of the New Woman," says Current Opinion. "Her troubles are those that will beset the next generation when suffrage has borne its fruit. Tagore's message to women seems to be: 'Do not pretend to possess a femininity which you have lost. Be yourself, be what you are, irrespective of the accident of sex.'"

"Truly from the East come the prophets and seers" says Mary Maud in Votes for Women, "and yet it seems wonderful that twenty five years ago, Tagore, an Indian, should have shown us the very heart of a modern woman, put his finger so surely on the pulse of what is now called the 'Woman's Movement.'"

TAGORE'S STORY.

"The drama is based on an old story from the Mahabharata, but Tagore has freely made it his own. Chitra is a daughter of the 'Kingly house of Manipur.' The Lord Shiva had promised to her 'royal grandfathers an unbroken line of male descent.' 'But the divine word proved powerless to change the spark of life in my mother's womb—so invincible was my nature, woman though I be.'"

"Chitra thus explains herself to the gods, Madana and Vasanta, the gods of Love and Eternal Youth. Her father has therefore brought her up as his son: her hands are 'strong to bend the bow,' but she has 'never learnt Cupid's archery, the play of eyes.' One day, in the forest in which she hunts freely, clad as a youth, she encounters a man, and knows herself for the first time a woman. He is Arjuna, the hero of the Kuru clan, and 'the one great idol of Chitra's dreams.'"

THE POWER OF THE WEAK.

"Overcome with emotion, she lets him go without a word, after he has told 'the boy,' who haughtily demands it, his name with an amused smile. Though knowing that Arjuna was vowed to twelve years' celibacy, Chitra next morning dons all a woman's unaccustomed dress, the richest she possesses, and seeks him in the forest temple of Shiva. Arjuna is very short with this grand and forward lady—tells her of his vow and 'that he is not fit to be her husband'; so Chitra, who is not 'the woman to nourish her despair in lonely silence, feeding it with nightly tears and covering it with the daily patient smile, a widow from birth,' seeks the help of the gods, asking for the 'power of the weak' and 'the weapon of the unarmed hand.' For, as she tells them—

"It is the labour of a lifetime to make one's true self known and honoured. Had I but the needed time I could win his heart by slow degrees, and ask no help of the gods."

"She knows the value of a man's vow—'unnumbered saints and sages have surrendered the merits of a lifelong penance at the feet of a woman!' And that she may bring to her feet the beloved Arjuna, she asks that that 'primal injustice, an unattractive plainness,' may be removed from her, and for a single day she may be 'superbly beautiful even as beautiful as was the sudden blooming of love in my heart.'"

"Not for a day, but for a year the gods grant her her request. The Princess is supposed to go on a pilgrimage, and the now beautiful Chitra repairs to Shiva's temple and again meets Arjuna. He soon kneels at her feet, 'her love-hungered guest,' but she reminds him of his well known vow.

MAN'S HIGHEST HOMAGE.

"You have dissolved my vow, even as the moon dissolves the night's vow of obscurity, is his answer.

"And Chitra, true woman, is not satisfied:—

"Whom do you seek in these dark days, in these milk-white arms, if you are ready to pay for her the price of your probity? Not my true self, I know. Surely this cannot be love, this is not man's highest homage to woman?"

"Arjuna tells her 'she is the wealth of a world, the end of all poverty, the goal of all effort, the one woman!' and she answers: Alas! it not I, not I, Arjuna. It is the deceit of a god! Go, go, my hero, go. Woo not falsehood, offer not your great heart to an illusion. Go?"

"But the moment of yielding comes: his call, 'Beloved, my most beloved!' is answered by her 'Take me, take all I am.' She tells the Love God:

"Heaven came so close to my hand that I forgot for a moment that it had not reached me. But when I woke in the morning from my dream, I found that my body had become my own rival. It is my hateful task to deck her every day, to send her to my beloved and see her caressed by him. O god! take back thy boon."

"THIS LOVE IS NOT FOR A HOME."

"The god will not deal so hastily with Arjuna—he bids Chitra wait for the autumn, then may Arjuna 'accept the abiding fruitful truth in thee!' So Chitra goes forth to win Arjuna—the woman to reveal herself to the man.

"Arjuna talks of home.

"Chitra: 'Home! But this love is not for a home!'

"Arjuna: 'Not for a home?'

"Chitra: 'No, never talk of that. Take to your house what is abiding and strong. Leave the little wild flower where it was born: leave it beautifully to die at the day's end, among all fading blossoms and decaying leaves. Do not take it to your palace hall to fling it on the stony floor which knows no pity for things that fade and are forgotten.'"

"Yes, no other. Why regret it?' asks Chitra.

"Arjuna fears that his warrior's right arm is forgetting its duties. 'The restless spirit is on me. I long to go hunting.'"

"Chitra inquires if the enchanted deer he pursues is caught. 'You give chase to the fleet-footed spirit of beauty, aiming at her every dart; yet this magic deer runs ever free and untouched.'"

"Arjuna is puzzled. 'Come close to me, unattainable one. . . . Let my heart feel you on all sides and live with you in the peaceful security of love.'"

"Why this vain effort to catch and keep the tints of the cloud, the dance of the waves, the smell of the flowers?' asks Chitra; for still it is her beauty he seeks.

"So they come to the last day of the enchanted year. Arjuna has heard the villagers talk of the danger of robbers, and is told that the warden of that kingdom is a woman, the Princess Chitra. He questions his love what kind of a woman this may be of whom they speak so much—the valour of a man and a woman in tenderness."

"Ah, but she is not beautiful! . . . Could you have seen her only yesterday by the forest path, you would have passed by without deigning to look at her."

"Yet still he thinks of Chitra—'In fulfilment of what vow has she gone; of what could she stand in need?'

"Her needs!' cries Chitra 'Why, what has she ever had, the unfortunate creature? Her very qualities are as prison walls shutting her woman's heart in a bare cell! Do not ask of her life—it will never sound sweet to man's ears.'"

"SHALL I THEN APPEAL?"

"But Arjuna only questions more, for his heart has grown restless and he would rouse his love to 'race on swift horses,' and arise 'out of this slumberous prison of green gloom' and 'perfumed intoxication.' The idea of the unknown and heroic Chitra has seized his mind. Then Chitra questions him closely. If by some magic she could shake herself free from voluptuous softness, fling the timid bloom of beauty from her body like borrowed clothes, stand up straight and strong with the strength of a daring heart, spurning the wiles and acts of twining weakness:—

"If I hold my head high like a tall young mountain fir, on longer trailing 'in the dust like a banana, shall I then appeal to man's eye? . . . Ah, no you could not bear it! . . . Would it please your heroic soul if the playmate of the night aspired to be the helpmeet of the day, if the left arm learnt to share the burden of the proud right arm?'"

THAT ULTIMATE

"Arjuna is puzzled:—

"I never seem to know you. . . . Sometimes in the enigmatic depths of your sad look, in your playful words mocking at their own meaning, I gain glimpses of a being trying to rend a veil. . . . Illusion is the first appearance of truth. I grope for that ultimate you, that bare simplicity of truth."

"And the next day he finds it.

"Standing before Arjuna in her original male attire, and with no god-given beauty, Chitra unveils herself:—

"I am not perfectly beautiful as the flowers with which I worshipped. I have many flaws and blemishes. I am a traveller in the great worldpath, my garments are dirty and my feet are bleeding with thorns. Where should I achieve flower-beauty, the unsolled loveliness of a moment's life? The gift that I proudly bring you is the heart of a woman."

"Here have all pains and joys gathered, the hopes, and fears, and shames of a daughter of the dust; here love springs up struggling towards immortal life. Herein lies an imperfection which is yet noble and grand. If the flower-service be finished, my master, accept this as your servant for the days to come."

"She confesses that she was that 'shameless one' who sought him in the temple of Shiva as though she were a man—he did right to reject her. 'she was my disguise.' Then by a boon of the gods she obtained for a year a radiant form, and 'wearing my hero's heart with the burden of that deceit. Most surely I am not that woman. I am Chitra—no goddess to be worshipped, nor yet the object of common pity to be brushed aside like a moth with indifference.' If he allows her to stand by his side in the path of danger, to share the great duties of his life, then he shall know her true self. 'To-day I can only offer you Chitra, the daughter of a King.'"

THE VISION.

"Arjuna says: 'Beloved, my life is full.'"

"So the story ends—the vision is completed. No 'lesser man,' no beautiful idol, but as the right hand to the left hand, as the bird's one wing to the other wing, so do the man and woman complete each other, so shall Humanity learn to soar on equal wings. First must the woman see this truly—truly know herself and the place she should fill; then she can reveal it to the man.

"Is this not the Woman's Movement, which Tagore has seen?"

... ily paper of our Moslem brothers.

... etor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading
... ay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes :
... known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of
... has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that ... stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to ... es and females on account of his long-standing experience in ... the line and has got them registered in Government amongst
... which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been ... very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood
... run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood
... removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving
... a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been con... vinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the
... advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the ... said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that ... we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a
... lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that must is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only 18s. 4d.. Postage extra. No Parhet necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

bears witness to the ever-growing demand for our products in Cricket, Tennis, Hockey and all games. Sportsmen realize that "the Perfecta" quality is unequalled. Graceful in design, they are lightly yet strongly made, giving pleasure to every user.

At the same time we make other qualities—to suit every pocket and can surely please you. Many hundreds of Clubs and thousands of individual players are using our goods to-day.
